I heard a story recently that humourously, if negatively, sums this up. At a similar Shabbaton, the Reform group was waiting to daven in the room the Orthodox were praying in. A member of the Orthodox minyan asked a waiting Reform Jew whether he could just go outside and meditate by a tree. In return, the Reform Jew asked whether the Orthodox could just mumble faster!

If we change that story so that each sees the positive value in each other's sense of authenticity, we achieve a form of pluralism that validates us as a people.

'Moral clarity must transcend politics'

Chezi Goldberg's family disappointed over absence of diplomatic condolence visit

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The brother of a Canadian killed in a terrorist attack on a Jerusalem bus is calling on Canada to display "moral clarity" in condemning violence against civilians and putting humanitarian gestures ahead of political calculations.

Ronn Goldberg, brother of Canadian youth counsellor Yechezkel (Chezi) Goldberg who was killed in a Jan. 29 suicide bombing in Jerusalem, said his family was "disappointed" that no one from the Canadian Embassy in Israel or the diplomatic mission in Ramallah called on the family during the seven-day period of mourning following his brother's death. Such a visit would have been a compassionate, humanitarian gesture that would have superseded politics, Goldberg said at a news conference last week at the Israeli Consulate in downtown Toronto.

By refusing to visit the Goldberg shivah house because it is located beyond the Green Line, Canada "let politics take precedence. We're really giving in to these murderers," he said.

Asked what message he would give Prime Minister Paul Martin if he were to meet him, Goldberg said, "I would tell the prime minister that moral clarity has to transcend politics."

Goldberg was commenting on reports that Canadian envoys would not visit the family home in Betar Illit, a town of 16,000 near Bethlehem, because it is outside the borders of pre-1967 Israel, on land Canada considers illegally occupied.

Montreal may get Jewish museum

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A major announcement about plans for a multimillion-dollar Jewish museum in downtown Montreal is expected to be made "in a few weeks," says the project's spokesperson Herschel Segal.

Segal said the group behind the project has been in talks with the City of Montreal since June about acquiring and developing municipal land at the southeast corner of St. Laurent and de Maisonneuve boulevards, not far from what was once the Jewish immigrant district.

But he said, while the group believes the museum should be downtown, that "is not the only site we have looked at."

The museum would be incorporated into a $40-million, mixed-use complex, said Segal, head of the Le Chateau clothing store chain. The museum would cost somewhere between $6 million and $9 million, and would be sustained through revenue from the renting of office or residential space.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Baranovski Appeal

TORONTO — Meir Mariani and William (Lee) Cochrane, the two men sentenced to 10 years in jail for the 1999 beating death of teenager Matti Baranovski, are seeking leave to appeal their manslaughter convictions. Possible grounds are that the evidence could not reasonably support the verdicts, there were errors in the judge's charge to the jury, and a third accused, Daniel Weiz, was acquitted based on similar evidence, Mariani's lawyer, Richard Litkowski, told the Globe and Mail.

Rabbi Lau Visits

OTTAWA — Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, former chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Israel, visited Ottawa for two days last month. He spoke to Jewish students, met community leaders, gave two major lectures and taught at the Kollel of Ottawa Centre for Jewish Education, which co-sponsored the trip with Ottawa United Jewish Appeal.

WORLD

Szarvas Fellowships

NEW YORK — Applications are being accepted for Szarvas Fellowships, administered by the American Joint Jewish Distribution Committee and the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation. They give 60 North American Jewish students in grades 10 or 11 the chance to spend two weeks at summer camp in Szarvas, Hungary, with 2,000 Jewish teens from around the world. Visit www.szarvas.org to apply. Deadline is March 1.

SS Man Avoids Trial

BERLIN — A former SS man will not have to stand trial for the 1944 murder of a member of the Dutch Resistance in a labour camp in Holland. Dutch-born Herbitus Bikker, 88 – one of the last alleged Nazi war criminals to stand trial in Germany – is reportedly unable to concentrate on proceedings, and the case is to be dropped. The state prosecutor expressed disappointment with the decision. The trial resulted from an investigation launched in 1996 after reports emerged about Bikker's past. He was convicted of murder and sentenced to death in Holland in 1949, but the sentence was later commuted to life in jail. He escaped in 1952 and found haven in Germany, where, as a former soldier in the German army, he was safe from extradition.

RABBININC BLESSING: Yona Metzger, Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi, blessed European Union Commission President Romano Prodi last week at the dedication of the first Jewish teacher training academy to open in Vienna since the Holocaust. Rabbi Metzger was giving Prodi the Humanitarian Achievement Award of the Rabbinical Center of Europe. Prodi told more than 100 assembled rabbis that there is no place for racism or anti-Semitism in Europe. Earlier, the rabbis met with Austrian President Thomas Klestil, who pledged that Austria will fight anti-Semitism. [RNS/Reuters photo]

NYC Jewish Poverty Up

NEW YORK — Jewish poverty has worsened in New York over the past decade. The number of poor Jewish households in 2002 grew to 244,000, or 15 per cent of the 1.66 million people in Jewish households in greater New York, up from 10 per cent of 1.55 million Jews in a 1991 study, according to the 2004 Report on Jewish Poverty from the Metropolitan Council on Jewish Poverty and UJA-Federation of New York.

No Funding for PA TV?

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A provision in the budget proposed last week by the Bush administration pledges that no U.S. funds may be used "to provide equipment, technical support, consulting services or any other form of assistance to the Palestinian Broadcasting Corporation." There was no explanation for the move, but criticism of Palestinian incitement has increased in Congress in recent months.

Suspect Arrested

ISTANBUL — Turkish police have arrested a suspect in the November suicide truck bombings at two Istanbul synagogues. The man, detained Jan. 30, is alleged to be a leader of a Turkish Al Qaeda cell and one of the attacks' planners.

Mombasa Trial Starts

NAIROBI — Four Kenyans went on trial last week for the November 2002 terrorist attacks on Israeli targets in Mombasa, Kenya. The men are alleged to have planned the suicide bombing of the Israeli-owned Paradise Hotel that killed 15 people, including three Israelis, and tried to shoot down an Israeli passenger plane, on orders of Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, an Al Qaeda mastermind still at large.

French Debate Religion

PARIS — The French National Assembly last week debated a government-sponsored bill to ban conspicuous religious symbols in state schools. The bill, which was to be voted on this week, is backed by most lawmakers from the governing UMP Party and the main opposition Socialist Party. Most Jewish groups also back it. If it becomes law, religious symbols will be banned starting next fall.

JDL Man Questioned

LOS ANGELES — U.S. investigators are questioning Jewish Defence League activist Earl Krugel about the 1985 murder of an Arab-American leader. Krugel, who pled guilty last year for his role in a plot to bomb a California mosque and the office of Congressman Darrell Issa, has not been forthcoming about a possible link to the murder of Alex Odeh, western regional director of the American Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, the Desert Sun newspaper reported. Under Krugel's plea agreement, he must co-operate with police. The JDL has denied involvement in Odeh's murder.

Community leaders divided over use of 'spanking'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Reaction has been mixed in the Jewish community to the recent Supreme Court of Canada decision that allows parents and teachers to use reasonable physical force while disciplining children.

In upholding the constitutionality of section 43 of the Criminal Code – the so-called "spanking" defence – for what Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin called "educational and corrective purposes," the high court showed common sense, says Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, retired general studies principal of Eitz Chaim Day Schools.

"The court is one of the few groups that understands the various considerations in the [issue]," he says.

Rabbi Jakobovits says that although he spoke out against hitting and any other form of corporal punishment long before it became a public issue, "recognizing it as a criminal offence would be an unwarranted intrusion into family life.

"Police have no place in the family. That would turn a high proportion of the population into criminals, and the court seems to recognize that."

Children's rights are not the issue, he says.

"It is absurd to think of children as equal to their parents. They are not the same. We control children differently than we control adults, but we can control children without corporal punishment."

He is firmly against any form of punishment – including threats of punishment – in the classroom.

"All that does is lower a teacher's status in the eyes of the students. If teachers do not resort to such tactics, they get immediate respect."

Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, does not see anything controversial about the decision.

"The court's decision fits in well with what our tradition teaches," he says. "Although we are not allowed to beat our adult children, minor children can be disciplined with [minimal] physical force. That is allowable."

Supreme Court rules on corporal punishment

But Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, executive director of Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish learning, says she teaches a course on spiritual parenting in which she tells parents there is always a better alternative than corporal punishment.

"Hitting a child does not send the right message. Spanking teaches fear rather than self-discipline. Every child is capable of changing their behaviour.

"[Hitting children] is a quick and easy punishment that allows parents to blow off steam, but in the Jewish tradition, we do not encourage violence. We do not want children to hit each other, but how do we teach them that if we hit them?"

Hitting does not teach children about tshuvah, Rabbi Goldstein says. "They need to learn to perform acts of tshuvah for small and large wrong doings."

Ron Levin, executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service, is concerned about the court's decision because "it contributes to an environment where violence toward children is acceptable.

"Social workers may find it difficult to counsel parents in using non-violent, positive approaches to discipline if the parents feel that section 43 supports them in using force to correct their children," he says.

Marvin Bernstein, director of policy development and legal support at the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies, says JF&CS' position is that all forms of physical violence, including physical punishment, are harmful and unacceptable.

"A growing body of research and knowledge shows that physical punishment is ineffective, and, at best, achieves short-term, externally enforced control, motivated by fear.

Try touring Israel

From the editor's desk

One of the still-suffering "casualties" of the "low-grade" war of terror launched against Israel 3½ years ago has been the country's economy.

For the immediate half-decade prior to the outbreak of what Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat euphemistically called the Al Aqsa intifadah, the economy of the area soared.

The prospect of an end to the conflict with the Palestinians, combined with Israel's talented, highly diversified work force; a national ethos that celebrates risk-taking, innovation and problem-solving; and a repository of universities and other institutions of higher learning whose partnerships with industry yield leading-edge advancements in science and technology, helped send the economy to new levels of growth.

With the apparent advent of a new level of political stability throughout the area, investment from overseas poured in. Larger-than-ever numbers of people were employed. A feeling of confidence and optimism pervaded. This was as true for the Palestinian economy as it was for Israel.

Both riding and steering the invigorated economy was tourism. Tourists flocked to the region, crossing from Israel to neighbouring countries and back with an ease and a curiosity not experienced in more than half a century, disbursing hard cash directly into the hands of the people of the area – often in coveted American currency – like an irrigation pipe splashing water in all directions onto parched earth.

But Arafat's war put paid to that halcyon prosperity.

The ensuing loss of human life has been evidence of his criminality. But the accompanying loss of the newfound economic prosperity was evidence of his grotesque folly.

The unceasing violence sent Israel's economy into a tailspin. Tourists avoided travelling to Israel. And the Palestinian economy was ruined, adding penury and financial misery to virtually every Palestinian household.

The nadir in the flow of tourists to Israel was in 2002. Barely 900,000 tourists visited that year.

The barrage of violent news images was so unrelenting that travellers stayed away, not surprisingly, out of fear. Sadly, if indeed not shockingly, the highest drop-off in visitors was among North American Jewry.

Alas, we did not bear well the "burden" of our kinship. We surrendered to our fears.

Our collective lack of nerve these past 40 months has been an eerie, unsettling re-enactment of the fear that gripped the majority of the 12 Jewish scouts who were sent by Moses to gather information about the land they and their kinsfolk would soon possess. Though the scouts did indeed bring back a report of a land "flowing with milk and honey," they also surrendered to their fears in contemplation of the obstacles that lay ahead. "We were as grasshoppers in our own eyes."

Thus, frightened by their own vulnerability, they considered themselves incapable of doing what needed to be done and were, in the result, effectively immobilized.

Last year, the level of tourism to Israel exceeded the lowly flow of 2002 by 23.3 per cent. Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics reported on Jan 14, 2004, that 1.063 million tourists visited Israel in 2003. Perhaps the pattern of our modern day immobilization has been reversed?

To help boost tourism to the tiny Jewish state, the government of Israel has invited some 500 tourism professionals, community leaders and business delegates to attend a special conference in Jerusalem – The Prime Minister's Conference on Tourism in Israel – later this month.

"During this vital meeting," Israel's tourism minister Benny Elon said, "leaders from Israel and around the world will gather to review and discuss the prospects of tourism to Israel today… Our goal is to forge a brighter, more dynamic future for tourism to the State of Israel.

"Tourism plays a critical role in the economy of the State of Israel," Elon explained. "It employs – directly and indirectly – a quarter-million Israelis, and it plays a unique role in the morale of our people. Understandably, the uprising that began in September 2000 has had a devastating effect on overseas tourism, and it is our aim that this conference succeeds in seeking methods to redress these effects. We are convinced that, together, we will be able to build a new confidence in our destination."

A Canadian contingent of 67 persons will be at the conference. Dani Shahal, consul for tourism at the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada, told The CJN that Israel wants to build on this momentum of last year's increase in tourism and that he was "looking forward to working with the Canadian delegates upon our return from the conference to continue promoting tourism to Israel from Canada.

The conference takes place Feb. 22 to 24. The CJN will be there to bring back reports for our readers.

Israel is indeed flowing with milk and honey. But there are no obstacles – no giants, no terrorists – to ever again make us see ourselves "as grasshoppers in our own eyes."

SHALOM ENDORSES CIJA: Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom poses with Mark Waldman, co-chair of CIJA-PAC, the newly formed membership-based public affairs committee of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA). During a recent briefing in Israel, the two men discussed CIJA and events in the Middle East. In a statement from Jerusalem, Shalom urged Canadian Jews to join CIJA-PAC, saying it "will help to play a major role in hasbarah [advocacy] for the State of Israel." CIJA was set up last year to co-ordinate the advocacy efforts of Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee, the National Committee for Jewish Campus Life and CIJA-PAC. Waldman said Foreign Ministry officials "were impressed by the clear focus and strategic direction CIJA brings to advocacy as the only co-ordinated national structure for Israel and Jewish advocacy." CIJA CEO Hershell Ezrin said the Israeli officials see CIJA as "as a potential model for other countries."

He suggested that view was unwarranted in the case of his late brother.

What's more, he said, Canadian officials operate on both sides of the Green Line and former prime minister Jean Chrétien himself crossed it on a matter of political expediency.

"A shivah call is not a political statement. Is is an act of compassion, a humanitarian gesture," he said.

Goldberg's critique of the government was echoed by Conservative foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day, who issued a press release saying it was "an outrage that the Canadian ambassador… refused to visit and pay respects to a Jewish Canadian… This cancelled visit is an insult to all victims of terror and is an example of the Martin government's continuing anti-Israel bias.

"The government continues its untenable position of moral equivalence between terrorists and their victims. Implicit in this insult is the message that civilians that live in a politically incorrect part of Israel are fair game for terrorists."

Speaking during question period in Parliament last week, Conservative MP Jason Kenney said the decision by the Canadian ambassador to Israel to schedule and then cancel a condolence visit "compound[ed] the Goldbergs' tragedy with an insult from their own government."

Responding to Kenney's remarks, Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham said he had "offered the condolences of the Canadian government, the Canadian people and of this Parliament.

"Our ambassador was prepared to meet with the family in Jerusalem, which is appropriate. Unfortunately, that was not possible. There was a suggestion they might meet elsewhere, but our ambassador, as the American ambassador and others do, takes the position that they do not go into places which are disputed at this time.

"We are willing to meet with the family. We offered them our condolences. It is a very sincere wish on our part that the family understand our deep sympathy at this time."

At the press conference, Goldberg defended Israel's controversial security fence, saying every government has the right to defend its citizens. He likened the suicide bus attack to last week's bloody attack on a Moscow subway and to the October 2002 bombing by Al Qaeda of an Indonesian nightclub, suggesting they are part of a pattern of complete lack of respect for life. He said the carnage from the bus bombing was "no different than the Holocaust. It was a lack of respect for human rights and dignity."

He urged Canadians not to glorify a group that uses suicide bombing as a means to a political end: "These are not romantic freedom fighters. They are vicious murderers."

Goldberg, a radiologist at a Toronto hospital, recounted his brother's work with troubled teens, his care for others, his love of life and his refusal to be cowed by terrorism. Once when a bomb went off around the time of Purim, he insisted the festival's celebration go on. He dressed in a clown suit to bring joy and laughter to a group of children, but he was crying the whole time under his clown mask, his brother recalled.

Yechezkel Goldberg, who was 41, was on a Jerusalem bus on his way to work when suicide terrorist Ali Jaara detonated explosives he had strapped to his body, killing Goldberg and 10 other passengers. Fifty others were wounded. Hamas and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a wing of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement, took credit for the attack.

Goldberg, who moved to Israel 10 years ago, is survived by his American-born wife Shifra and seven children.

Greater Toronto Area

New federation president thrives on change

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ted Sokolsky likes to think of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto as "a large tent in which everyone is invited and everyone participates."

The new president of the organization, who replaced Allan Reitzes in January, said there have been tremendous changes at the federation over the past 10 years and that the Greater Toronto Jewish community, numbering an estimated 180,000, can expect to see "more of the same."

Most notably, in the recent past, the organization dramatically increased its fundraising – with the annual campaign almost doubling from $34 million in 1995 to $65 million in 2003 and the Federation Foundation growing its assets from $23 million to almost $120 million over a four-year period. It also launched Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT), a project focused on the recent redevelopment of the Miles Nadal JCC and the building of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life downtown, the Lipa Green/Bathurst Jewish Centre complex in northern Toronto and the new 50-acre multi-purpose campus expected to open in 2006 in Richmond Hill.

Sokolsky, 53, thrives on change, he said in an interview in his office in the Lipa Green Building. One of his priorities, he added, is to "make people around me comfortable with those changes."

His philosophy includes taking "appropriate risks," among them the ambitious campus planned for Vaughan. "Everything in life is a risk," he said. "The bigger risk is not doing anything, which is what we have done for two generations."

Steeles Avenue, which divides the northernmost part of Toronto from York Region (including Vaughan), "is probably an artificial boundary," he acknowledged, but if Vaughan were in the United States, Sokolsky said, it would have had two Jewish community centres and probably its own federation by now. "It's unheard of in the United States of America that a community of 60,000 has so few facilities."

Now is the time to "roll out the fundraising" for JTT, which will be separate from the annual campaign, said Sokolsky, who is the federation's immediate past vice-president of integrated fundraising and the recipient four years ago of United Jewish Communities' Vivian Rabineau Award for Outstanding Achievement in Federation Fundraising.

Sokolsky said he believes that while funds raised are important, the JTT model shows that the federation can also serve as a resource for expertise in marketing, planning and fundraising for individual organizations.

A Toronto native, Sokolsky grew up in Bathurst Manor, a predominantly Jewish area, and attended Hebrew school at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue through Grade 12. As a result, he said, he has "a very strong connection to the Jewish community and a real sense of Jewish learning."

He was bitten by the "Jewish community bug" while working at B'nai Brith Youth Organization as director of its Lake Ontario region, 32 years ago. A recent graduate of York University with a bachelor's degree in sociology, Sokolsky thought at the time it would be a way to earn some money while working on his master's degree before he could become a university professor.

The experience changed his life careerwise and personally. He met his wife Liz, now vice-president of education for Birthright Israel, at a BBYO conference. She was working for the organization in Montreal at the time.

Raising funds for BBYO through Jewish federations in the American cities he served was Sokolsky's first experience creating Jewish communal partnerships, he said.

Federation is not a government and contributions are not taxes, although some people view them that way, said Sokolsky. "We're not entitled to your gift. We have to earn your gift every year. ... It's a partnership."

CJC 'still hoping' for advance look at The Passion

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress isn't giving up hope of getting a sneak peek at Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ, despite being left out of 10 such previews last month and having an earlier invitation withdrawn.

And as of last week, reports said Gibson, possibly responding to protests from Jewish critics, has decided to delete the so-called blood curse – the historic source of many of the charges of deicide and Jewish collective guilt in the death of Jesus – from the film's final cut.

Gibson's controversial $25 million (US) epic about the last hours in the life of Jesus, which has been slammed in Jewish circles for encouraging anti-Semitism, was screened for some 9,000 Christian pastors and church leaders in 10 Canadian cities last month. Although three rabbis and three Jewish members of a Christian-Jewish dialogue in Montreal were invited by a local evangelical group to view the film, CJC's attempts to see it have failed.

"We're still hoping," CJC spokesperson Ron Singer told The CJN, "but all our efforts have been unsuccessful."

On Jan. 12, CJC's Pacific region wrote to the film's Canadian distributor, Equinoxe Films, requesting an advance screening for members of Vancouver's Jewish-Christian Dialogue.

In reply, Anna Maria Muccilli of A.M. Public Relations in Toronto said there would be no public screenings of the movie for any organizations.

However, she said advance promotional screenings for the media would be organized in eight major markets. "We will set aside a limited number of passes for special interest groups to be included in these screenings," to take place Feb. 18 or 19.

Mel Gibson

Muccilli added: "We would be happy to provide you with a number of invitations to the Vancouver screening once we know the date and theatre location."

However, the offer was withdrawn on Jan. 20, when Muccilli wrote CJC Pacific region executive director Erwin Nest to say that "we have been notified that the distributors have decided not to go ahead with promotional or advance screenings of the film."

The CJN's calls to Muccilli were not returned.

Nest told The CJN he was not offended by the development, as the initial offer came from the Canadian distributor but the withdrawal came from the U.S. distributor.

"The Canadian distributor was very helpful. But it wasn't up to them," Nest said.

For the most part, Canadian evangelical leaders who have seen the film have said they detect no anti-Semitic message in it. They have also tried to reassure Jews with theological arguments about the death of Jesus – chiefly, that it was God who killed Jesus to absolve all humanity of sin.

As The CJN reported last week, two Montreal rabbis and a Jewish member of a local Jewish-Christian dialogue who viewed a rough cut of the movie on Jan. 13 agreed the film portrays Jews as the prime instigators in the death of Jesus.

They also said that despite reports that the blood curse would be omitted, it was in the version they had seen.

Jewish leaders have warned for more than a year that the passage from the Book of Matthew – in which the high priest Caiaphas calls down a kind of curse on the Jews by declaring of the crucifixion, "His blood be on us and on our children" – has been used to accuse Jews of collective responsibility for Jesus' death, and has been at the root of violent Christian anti-Semitism for centuries.

The New York Times reported last week that a "close associate" of Gibson said the scene would not make the film's final cut.

"It didn't work in the focus screenings," the associate said. "Maybe it was thought to be too hurtful, or taken not in the way it was intended. It has been used terribly over the years."

But Abraham Foxman, the U.S. Anti-Defamation League's national director, said even if the scene is deleted, the only hope of softening anti-Semitic fallout from the film is for Gibson to appear on-screen at the end and say something such as:

"I did this film because I believe I was inspired by the Holy Ghost. I believe that Jesus suffered for all mankind and that He wanted us to love and not to hate. Some people want to put the blame for His death on the Jews. That is wrong."

Foxman has also rejected an olive branch from Gibson.

In a Jan. 30 letter, Gibson asked Foxman to set an "example for all our brethren" by showing respect and "love for each other despite our differences." He called Foxman "a man of integrity and... of faith," adding, "I do not take your concerns lightly."

Foxman replied that the letter "does not address any of the issues we raised" and does "not mitigate our concerns about the potential consequences" of the The Passion of the Christ, which Foxman and others contend unequivocally blames Jews for Jesus' death.

In an upcoming Reader's Digest article, Gibson reportedly said he was surprised by the intensity of the controversy. "It kind of put me back on my heels a little bit," he said.

Bold plan to bring tomorrow closer

Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is a strong-willed man who evokes equally strong emotions in others. But love him or hate him, one must concede he is a man of bold tactics and far-sighted strategies. That Sharon's tactics and strategies have not always succeeded is a testament to human fallibility. But that he can turn corners quickly while others prefer to wait for traffic to stop is a testament to his daring.

In a stunning disclosure last week in the pages of Ha'aretz, one of Israel's leading daily newspapers and generally harshly critical of his policies, Sharon announced that he had instructed his officials to prepare a plan to relocate the residents in up to 17 of the 21 Israeli communities in the Gaza Strip.

The relocation plan would be the second pillar of a two-pillar program of disengagement from the Palestinians. The first, of course, is the construction of the security fence.

Typical of Israeli politics, the announcement was received by many observers with howls of skepticism. Sharon is only trying to deflect attention away from his growing legal problems, the cynics sneered.

But these protests notwithstanding, a majority of Israelis support Sharon's proposals. They, along with their prime minister, abhor the status quo. After more than 40 months of violent confrontation with Palestinian terrorists and thugs, Israel's economy rests on a precarious, narrow ridge that crumbles away bit by bit each day. Morale is low. Israelis' trust in their Palestinian neighbours has been shattered. In January alone, security forces foiled 10 suicide attacks. But one attacker got through the safety net on Jan. 29, killing 11 Israelis and wounding more than 50 others in Jerusalem.

Thus, the majority of Israelis no longer wish to wait for a corrupt, ineffective, dissembling and treacherous Palestinian leadership to help usher in a better tomorrow. They prefer to find it themselves.

But true to the irony that renders so much of Middle East politics absurd, a long list of naysayers oppose Sharon's plan to unilaterally dismantle the Gaza settlements.

- Egypt fears the anarchy and chaos that would ensue in Gaza and possibly spill to Sinai if Israeli authority departs.
- Jordan fears the pressure on its own borders that would result from the precedent of an Israeli withdrawal.
- The Palestinian Authority fears a final, fatal erosion of the last vestiges of its ability to control its territory.
- The Israeli far-left fears unilateral separation and relocation would deal a mortal blow to the current PA leadership.
- The Israeli far-right fears forfeiting any land of Greater Israel.
- The American administration is reluctant to endorse Sharon's plan because it has more pressing issues to deal with.

Sharon's relocation/disengagement plan is indeed bold. In truth, however, given the fractious, unreliable, imploding nature of the PA leadership, what real choices does he have?

Appalled and ashamed

As a Canadian, I was appalled and ashamed that the Canadian ambassador to Israel, Donald Sinclair, cancelled a condolence visit to Yechezkel Goldberg's family because they live in the West Bank. The spokesperson for the Canadian Department of Foreign Affairs, Marie-Christine Lilkoff, said it is against Canadian policy for its officials to make visits to the "occupied territories."

All Canadians should protest this shameful attitude and call for the situation to be immediately rectified. Goldberg served in the Canadian armed forces and was a proud and loyal Canadian. It is an embarrassment for his family to be treated in such a disrespectful manner during a time of mourning.

Remove untrustworthy column

No one can be as acutely aware as the editor of The CJN of the left-right division in our community over Israeli politics. Personally, I am disgusted by the mindless jingoism I see in The CJN and the vitriolic attacks made by some letter writers whenever liberal sentiments are aired.

My problem with the Feb. 5 issue of The CJN is the Myths and Facts column. Usually, the column tries to bring unbiased facts to bear on controversial issues. But in this case, the author betrayed a terrible right-wing attitude by dismissing the value of Palestinian prisoner releases (a controversial idea, but with much merit) and protests by air force pilots against the assassination of terrorists (also controversial, but also with much merit).

So readers can no longer trust the Myths and Facts column as an authoritative source of information. Indeed, I feel rather foolish by uncritically absorbing the author's material until this point. The column has got to go. It is a waste of paper and is a further right-wing annoyance to readers.

Reply to Canadian Jewish Congress

In "Congress Responds" (Letters to the Editor, CJN, Jan. 15), David Birnbaum, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), expresses surprise at some of the things I said in an interview with The CJN ("Les droits des survivants de la Shoah bafoués en France?" Sept. 18, 2003, Montreal edition; "Survivor seeks compensation from French gov't," Jan. 1, Toronto edition).

I was critical of CJC-Q for not doing its utmost to inform Holocaust survivors living in Canada of the steps being taken by France to compensate families who had been financially victimized during the war.

It is important to realize that after the war, about 10,000 Holocaust survivors chose to flee from France – a country that contributed greatly to the destruction of their families – to become Canadian citizens. To this day, the French institutions responsible for compensating Canadian survivors have received very few requests for compensation, whether for the material goods the survivors lost or for their lifetime pension established by then-prime minister Lionel Jospin. That means the survivors living in Canada were not sufficiently informed of their rights.

CJC-Q contends the opposite. It is true that CJC-Q president Joseph Gabay accompanied me when I met with the assistant French consul in Montreal, but Birnbaum, contrary to what he states in his letter, did not arrange for me to meet the Canadian Jewish media. My relationship with The CJN goes back to 1998, when my book, L'Abus de Confiance, appeared in Canada. As for Radio Shalom, it was a Jewish journalist from France who put our survivor advocacy organization in touch with program director Robert Lévy.

As for the synagogues, it was basically thanks to the article in The CJN that Canadian survivors were informed of their rights.

Furthermore, Birnbaum does not mention my request, to which he has never responded, that the group, together with CJC, go to Ottawa to speak to the minister of foreign affairs about the scandalous way the French government is treating requests for compensation from Jews whose goods were seized in France during World War II.

Certainly, CJC has been involved in various international Jewish proceedings involving requests for restitution. However, all that talking may have appeased the conscience of those involved, but it did not help the Jewish survivors.

I do not want us to be adversaries. All our energies must be united to fight against forgetfulness and anti-Semitism and in defence of Israel. Nevertheless, we expect the CJC to undertake a real campaign to inform and guide Holocaust survivors living in Canada and not simply to be content with expressing their intention to do so. As far as I am concerned, the matter is closed.

Stop bashing the media

The mainstream media have tuned us out. They are tired of the earth-shattering calls and accusations of anti-Semitism made in the last 20 years by members of the Jewish community about a bunch of kids who have pushed over gravestones in Jewish cemeteries. The media have become suspicious of our claims of anti-Semitism and not just because of the bias that much of the Jewish community claims is rampant in the "liberal press."

Most media outlets are tired of the "slippery slope" argument about how hatred against Jews started in Germany, as well as our claims that hatred of Jews is different from hatred directed against other groups.

It must be remembered that newspaper articles are not talmudic texts. They are produced under deadline and contain many throwaway phases that have no hidden, underlying bias, but merely reflect an editor who wants his copy.

Now that real anti-Semitism has come back, it might be time to stop questioning the media's motives, drop the liberal/conservative, left/right ideology and help reporters recognize that this is the real thing.

Perspectives

A disaster in the making at the UN

By DAVID H. GOLDBERG

The nadir in Israel's relationship with the United Nations was reached on Nov. 10, 1975, when the General Assembly (GA) adopted Resolution 3379, labelling Zionism "a form of racism."

However, historians might look back on the current, 58th session of the GA as ushering in a new low point in Israel-UN relations. What is at stake is not only Israel's standing in the UN, but the integrity of the world body itself and the principles of fairness and equality upon which it is constructed.

Things were not supposed to turn out this way.

Last September, Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom posed a challenge to the GA. He encouraged it to "rise above the tired politics of yesterday and adopt a new, courageous agenda for tomorrow." Central to this, he said, was an end to "the partisan hostility that has taken over the Middle East agenda." Shalom was referring specifically to the fact that the important work of the GA and other UN agencies has been systematically sidelined in favour of the Palestinian goal of delegitimizing Israel.

Regrettably, Shalom's sage advice went unheeded.

As had been the case in every UN session since 1967, the 58th GA has adopted some 20 resolutions affecting Israel.

Some of the resolutions unfairly condemned Israel's continued presence in the "occupied territories" while ignoring its proven readiness to exchange territory for a secure peace with a serious negotiating partner. Still others hypocritically sought to restrict Israel's right to self-defence while legitimizing Palestinian terrorism.

The UN's hypocrisy did not end there.

First, the GA reaffirmed support for a resolution condemning Israel's alleged targeting of Palestinian children. But it then torpedoed an Israeli-sponsored resolution condemning terrorism against Israeli children. The GA then acquiesced to the deliberate omission of anti-Semitism from a resolution condemning racism, while declining to support a separate resolution expressing concern about the global resurgence of anti-Jewish sentiment.

These offensive resolutions were trumped by additional ones adopted by the GA sitting in its reconvened "10th Emergency Special Session."

By a vote of 144 for (including Canada) and 4 against, with 12 abstentions, the GA adopted an emergency resolution on Oct. 21 declaring that Israel's construction of a security fence on a route "departing from the armistice line of 1949" is "illegal under relevant provisions of international law and must be ceased and reversed."

This tendentious resolution was criticized on several grounds.

- Its emphasis was misplaced. The issue was not the anti-terror fence, but the infiltration of terrorists from the West Bank. If the Palestinian Authority (PA) had fulfilled its obligations to fight terrorism under the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan, there would have been no need for a security fence.
- By restricting Israel's right to self-defence, it undermined the UN Charter's core principle of equality-among-states.
- The Fourth Geneva Convention prohibits an "occupying power" from taking measures that permanently alter political facts. But this does not apply to the security fence, inasmuch as it can be moved or indeed demolished the moment terrorism ends and diplomacy resumes. Moreover, by instituting temporary measures to restore order in the West Bank, Israel is fulfilling its legal responsibilities under the Geneva Convention.

Several additional criticisms were made about the resolution's reference to the fence's location:

- The reference to "the 1949 armistice line" was misleading. The "Green Line" was never intended to be a political border, only a temporary line separating Israel from the West Bank pending an Israeli-Jordanian treaty.
- The fence's present route roughly approximates the Green Line with adjustments eastward to defend settlement blocs.
- Despite accusations of an Israeli "land grab," the sole purpose of the fence is to deter terrorist incursions. Efforts have been made to avoid intruding on the lives of the Palestinians, and compensation has been provided for Palestinian-owned land needed for the fence.
- Prudence dictates that Israel take measures to put maximum distance between West Bank terror cells and their potential victims in Israel's heartland.

Unfortunately, the cogency of these arguments was lost on the anti-democratic majority in the GA in their rush to support the campaign to delegitimize Israel. The next step in this campaign was taken with a second GA emergency resolution, adopted on Dec. 8.

By a vote of 90 for and 8 against, with 74 abstentions (including Canada), the GA asked the International Court of Justice (ICJ) at The Hague to provide an opinion about the "legal consequences" of Israel's security fence.

The fact the resolution was supported by less than a majority of the GA constituted a moral victory for Israel. Nevertheless, the implications of the ICJ referral for Israel, for the "peace process," for the court itself and for the entire UN system could be serious.

The implications for Israel are significant. While the referral speaks about the fence, it will be the legitimacy of Israel's very presence in the disputed territories that will be on trial, with extraneous issues such as settlements, Jerusalem, refugees and water rights introduced for political effect.

Although the ICJ opinion is non-binding, a finding in favour of the Palestinians will open the floodgates to additional efforts to delegitimize Israel. The GA will certainly use the opinion as the basis for recommending that the Security Council impose economic and diplomatic sanctions against Israel. While Israel can probably rely on the United States to block such measures with its veto, the pressure on the United States could drive a wedge between Washington and Jerusalem.

The ICJ referral is also a serious setback to the peace process. When powerful international institutions restrict Israel's right to self-defence and subject it to incessant ridicule, there is no incentive for the Palestinians to end terrorism and resume negotiations.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a political dispute that can only be resolved through direct negotiations involving the parties themselves. Anything that works against the goal of resuming the diplomatic process, such as a politically motivated appeal to an international agency, is counter-productive.

Although Israel's presence in the West Bank will be on trial in The Hague, so too will the ICJ itself.

By agreeing to intervene in an international political dispute for which no judicial resolution is possible, the ICJ is seriously over-extending its mandate and jurisdictional reach. And by permitting its agenda to be hijacked by partisan interests, the court is undermining its own credibility to adjudicate legitimate international legal questions in the future.

Finally, the referral compromises the relevancy of the entire UN system. Since the 1970s, the agendas of UN agencies have been held captive by the goal of delegitimizing Israel. But by drawing the ICJ into this despicable process, the stakes have been raised exponentially, well beyond the Israeli-Palestinian arena. For if the Palestinians are able to challenge the legality of Israel's presence in the West Bank, what is to stop groups in other "occupied" areas – such as Afghanistan, Iraq, Chechnya and Tibet – from bringing their own claims before the court?

And if Israel's right to self-defence is restricted by the court, then what about the sovereign right of the United States to pursue Al Qaeda or of other countries to defend their citizens? If countries can no longer take for granted that their sovereign right to self-defence is above reproach, then why would they continue to have faith in the UN itself?

Clearly, the implications of the 58th UN General Assembly's referral to the International Court of Justice concerning Israel's anti-terror fence are far-reaching and potentially serious. (To assist readers in understanding this issue, the Canada-Israel Committee has prepared a brochure that will be inserted in next week's issue of The CJN.)

In dealing with this situation, Canada has balanced three important principles:

- Support for Israel's obligation to defend its citizens;
- Concern for the rights of the Palestinians; and
- Opposition to the politicization of UN agencies for partisan purposes and resolutions in international institutions that unfairly isolate Israel.

Canada supported the Oct. 21 General Assembly emergency resolution and abstained on the one on Dec. 8, citing concern about the impact of the security fence on the Palestinians. At the same time, Canada reiterated its support for Israel's right to self-defence, including erecting a fence (though not on what Canada considers "Palestinian land.") Canada also expressed a preference that the parties resolve the fence dispute through direct negotiations, rather than through a reference to the ICJ.

Throughout January, as the Canadian government contemplated its options regarding the ICJ referral, it remained receptive to Israel's concerns. Foreign Minister Bill Graham and Prime Minister Paul Martin's senior advisors took the unusual step of meeting with Alan Baker, Israel's point man on the referral. In addition, Martin discussed the issue with Israeli Foreign Minister Shalom at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

While no definitive commitments were made by Canada at these meetings, the positive atmosphere nevertheless gave Israeli officials a measure of hope.

On Jan. 30, Canada joined some 20 other democratic countries in submitting briefs to the ICJ challenging its authority to consider the legality of the security fence. To be sure, Canada's brief also expressed reservations about the fence's route. But, more importantly, it reflected Canada's appreciation, in principle, of Israel's obligation to address the tremendous security threat confronting its citizens on a daily basis.

While it is difficult to know for sure, the tragic death of one Canadian soldier and the wounding of three others in a Jan. 27 terrorist suicide bombing in Afghanistan may have contributed to the Martin government's decision three days later to oppose the ICJ's jurisdiction regarding the fence. The logic may have been that if the court can restrict the ability of one democratic country – Israel – to defend itself against terrorism, what is to stop it from restricting Canada from doing the same?

Also factoring into the equation may have been Martin's declared determination to lead efforts to reform the UN and end the exploitation and politicization of international institutions that has undermined the integrity of the entire multilateral system, which Canadians view as central to their foreign policy.

Will the principled stand taken by Canada be enough to persuade the ICJ to drop its consideration of the security fence? Will it be enough to avert a Palestinian-led "hatefest" against Israel in the streets of The Hague similar to the one at the World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in September 2001?

Perhaps not. But it does give Israelis and their supporters in Canada a sense that they are not alone. Moreover, it gives Canadians who do not relate to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but care deeply about the UN living up to the principles of fairness and equality among states enshrined in its charter, renewed hope that the multilateral system can be saved from the tyranny of the anti-democratic majority, which currently exploits it for partisan purposes.

Loving Jews, hating Judaism

Jewish-Christian dialogue poses problems for Jewish participants. Jews who are religiously liberal may have much in common with their Christian counterparts, but liberal Christians are often hostile to Israel. They perceive Palestinians as the underdog and Israel as the aggressor. As good Christians, they say they are on the side of the underdog. But even when they seem to respect Judaism, they appear to be less enamoured by Jews, particularly Israelis.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Last summer's General Council of the United Church of Canada is a case in point. At the same time as the council passed one of the most liberal and farsighted documents about its attitude to Judaism, it also debated several resolutions and petitions that advocated hostile measures against Israel. At times, it is difficult not to see such attacks as expressions of anti-Semitism.

By contrast, Christian evangelicals repeatedly affirm their unconditional support for the State of Israel and the Jewish people. But their theology often looks forward to the end of days when all Jews, finally reunited in their own land, will be ready to embrace Christ in anticipation of his second coming. That is why some openly support Jews for Jesus.

Though not all evangelicals are equally firm, and definitely not equally explicit, few would deny this basic theological tenet. But many insist that it is not biblical prophecy (theology) that motivates them, but biblical promises they see fulfilled before their very eyes (politics). It is the miracle of contemporary Israel rather than the aspirations of an eschatological Israel that moves them to support us.

Many Jews in Israel and elsewhere are prone to turn a blind eye to the theology in favour of political advantages. They warmly embrace the evangelicals and bask in their expressions of solidarity, their financial contributions to Israeli causes and their staunch support of the current Israeli government.

Christian evangelicals have become the darlings of Jewish right-wingers all over the world. Not to appear ungrateful, even liberals are reluctant to rebuff such warm expressions of Christian love and loyalty.

But rebuff we should, all expediency notwithstanding. As I once heard the Israeli historian Yehuda Bauer put it, "Evangelicals love Jews and hate Judaism." The moment we ignore their rejection of Judaism for the sake of short-term gains for Jews, we fall into the trap of mutual cynical exploitation.

As painful as I find it at times to deal with liberal Christians, I would rather persevere and argue with them than find myself the object of overt or covert Christian missionary activity masquerading as love. In the choice between those who respect Judaism and are critical of Jews versus those who love Jews to bits but despise Judaism, I take my chances with the former.

A chance to slow down and think

Being at home with the flu for the past week has been, in many ways, a good thing for me.

It has forced me to slow down the natural order of things, which in my lifestyle is frenzied, chaotic and overstuffed.

It has also given me the chance to read some wonderful books I wouldn't ordinarily have time for.

When your body is crying out for rest and you can no longer ignore it the way you could conceivably ignore, say, your mother, you get an opportunity to do a lot of reflection.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

One of the books I read last week that was particularly good for getting the rusty gears of my mind turning again was Maus.

The Pulitzer Prize-winning comic book on the Holocaust by author Art Spiegelman shed light on many interesting questions for me. In a way, there are some significant parallels between it and another excellent book I read recently – Life of Pi, by Canadian author Yann Martel.

Though the latter doesn't relate to Jewish matters, at least not directly, it is about something Jews are quite familiar with – the art of survival in particularly horrific circumstances.

Even though my temples have been pounding and I'm not quite positive that I will ever be able to taste or smell anything again, I was able to forget all that as I read of prisoners eating bread mixed with sawdust in Maus and of a castaway desperate to not die of hunger in Life of Pi.

Reading these books has been a rewarding, eye-opening and even cathartic experience.

I feel a sense of connection with the characters that rivals what I have felt with flesh and blood beings for awhile.

It seems that the ordeals we suffer in life make us take on a set of personality traits that serve as coping mechanisms. Sometimes these traits are questionable in the eyes of others.

For instance, one character in Maus professes embarrassment at the penny-pinching and miserly ways of his father, an Auschwitz survivor. But until you understand what it truly means to go hungry, you won't really be able to empathize with someone who saves an old tea bag to make an extra cup of tea.

It seems that the better off you are, the more your wants tend to stray from your needs – the two become totally and utterly unrelated.

Yet you really don't need all that much to be happy.

On a recent trip to Cuba, I marvelled at the simplicity of people's lives and how happy they were living on an average salary of only $12 a month.

A scene that will stay with me forever is a street band I saw comprised of local teens working with nothing more than a bunch of makeshift instruments and their own unwavering voices. Their clothes were ragged, their mouths partially toothless, but they danced and sang with such genuine beauty and enjoyment that it pierced me straight through the heart.

That was more beautiful and perhaps more telling of local culture and way of life than any museum tour could illustrate.

Something different that struck me about Maus is that the Holocaust survivor, even after all the anti-Semitism he has endured, expresses racist sentiments against black people.

This and the Cuba trip reminded me of my experience last month interviewing a poet who was nominated to be on a feature list of prominent Calgarians in my local newspaper.

Since being a poet doesn't really provide a lasting, tangible source of income, she had to take on a number of odd jobs to survive – some of them that might be considered menial or even demeaning.

I would think that having experiences like that would provide you with a certain sense of humility and a sense of not wanting to subject others to what has been inflicted upon you.

But this poet hung up on me twice with torrents of abuse, because she thought I was a telemarketer, before I had a chance to explain why I was calling.

It seems that sometimes survival makes you adopt the characteristics of what or who has made you captive, rather than what or who can set you free.

Acting as activists

Thousands of students in cities across the country Feb. 4 marched to protest the increasingly unbearable burden of rising tuition fees. Though the issue of post-secondary tuition is one of importance and in need of being addressed by the government, it seems to me that the slogans of a day's march may do little to accomplish the goal students have in mind.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

As a student at a small liberal arts college, I have become well-versed in the philosophy of revolution. Along with my peers, I have traced the evolution of western thought and the changes each progressive movement has tried to bring about. Marxist rhetoric, for example, is thrown around ubiquitously by those who believe philosophic ideals can be imported into the political sphere. As a group that most often goes unheard, students must find some means to advocate for the causes they believe in.

The problem, as I see it, lies in the fact that in an attempt to assemble mass support, the core issues fall by the wayside. In assuming the role of activists, we often feel forced to play the role of the revolutionary fighting the establishment, but fail to consider what it is we are fighting for.

Tuition fees are high, and an increasing number of students are faced with the growing burden of student loans. But for crowds of students to get up and demand a decrease in fees not only simplifies the problem, it displays an ignorance of the complexities surrounding the issue and does little to promote the cause. Pithy slogans may hold mass appeal, but they also lead to mass ignorance.

> 'We often feel forced to play the role of the revolutionary fighting the establishment, but fail to consider what it is we are fighting for'

In particular, student campaigns fail to articulate the need for better aid programs. A study at Memorial University in Newfoundland showed that a 10 per cent decrease in tuition fees over three years did nothing to change the socio-economic demographic of its student body. A reduction in fees does not come without consequences, and as Canadian schools struggle to compete with their international counterparts, there must be some source of funding to keep class sizes manageable and pay professors competitive salaries in the hopes of maintaining the quality of education.

There is no easy answer, and by no means do I purport to have one. What I do advocate is a better attempt at confronting the real issue. Don't waste money printing out "reduce tuition fees" buttons, but rather educate people on the issues and lobby in a meaningful and intelligent way.

If today's students are to be tomorrow's leaders, then we must hope for something better than the status quo. It is one thing to oppose the current state of affairs and it is quite another to propose a way to improve them. This year's protest against tuition fees will most certainly result in the same outcome as last year: a tuition increase of about seven per cent.

The first step is to get people to care, and it is clear that students do care. But caring isn't enough, and until we demand more from our leadership – not just slogans but real attempts to address the issues that matter – there is nothing for us to do but demand more from ourselves.

The Kirshner File

Overt racism permeated the U.S. army

On Oct. 10, 1974, Gen. George Brown, chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, scandalized the nation when he publicly complained about the alleged power of the "Israeli lobby" and suggested that American Jews were too powerful for their own good. "They own, you know, the banks in this country, the newspapers, you just look at where the Jewish money is in this country."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

With demands spreading for Brown's dismissal, president Gerald Ford reprimanded him, and Brown apologized for his "unfortunate" and "unfounded" remark.

That a U.S. army officer of such stature should have descended to such rank anti-Semitism was shocking. Yet Brown's outburst was in keeping with a now-outmoded set of racist attitudes that permeated the American military until quite recently.

The sad fact is that the army, and particularly its senior officer corps, was for decades a bastion of racism and anti-Semitism, according to Joseph Bendersky, author of The "Jewish Threat:" Anti-Semitic Politics of the U.S. Army, published by Perseus Books.

As he discloses in this measured book, the army's institutionalized anti-Semitism had a bearing on U.S. policy with respect to immigration, the fate of European Jews during and after the Holocaust and the establishment of Israel.

A professor and director of graduate studies in history at Virginia Commonwealth University, Bendersky stumbled upon this incendiary topic when he examined a declassified military intelligence division file concerning Jews. Covering the years 1918 to 1941, the dossier painted an unflattering picture of Jews and created an impression of a Jewish threat to U.S. interests at home and abroad.

Bendersky is at pains to point out that not all officers subscribed to such views, but he acknowledges that a culture of anti-Semitic stereotypes and bigotry pervaded the army and infected top-ranking soldiers.

This is hardly surprising.

In the first few decades of the 20th century, the officer corps was filled primarily by Anglo-Saxon Protestants, supplemented by officers of northern European, Scandinavian and German origin. "To many of them," he writes, "it was an article of faith, vindicated by science and historical experience, that only their race created and maintained higher culture and advanced civilizations."

Regarding themselves as guardians of true Americanism, they acquired most of their values and views before undergoing military training. But institutions such as West Point and the Army War College reinforced their ideas, beliefs and biases.

Exposed to Darwinist racial theories well into the 1930s, they learned about "superior" and "inferior" races, and were greatly influenced by academics such as Edward Alsworth Ross, a University of Wisconsin sociologist, and Charles Davenport, America's leading eugenicist. Ross claimed that "East European Hebrews have no reverence for law… pursue Gentile girls… and lower standards wherever they enter." Davenport was given to lecturing on "alien races" and "the racial factor in war and international relations."

Bendersky estimates that almost 2,000 officers, out of 14,000, ingested such pap. Of the 1,000 generals on active duty by the close of World War II, more than 600 were Army War College alumni. Among them were George Patton and Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Most of them paid lip service to the American norms of religious freedom and toleration, but were convinced that the United States should be a Christian, rather than a secular, nation.

Having concluded that Jews had played pivotal roles in revolutionary upheavals in Russia, Hungary and Germany, they believed that Jews were prone to Bolshevism. Gen. George Van Horn Moseley, a deputy chief of staff and Gen. Douglas MacArthur's old friend, held that communism and Jews were basically synonymous.

Joseph Bendersky

Officers in the 1920s and 1930s were generally xenophobic, fearing that radical, non-Anglo-Saxon immigrants would inalterably change American society. Conditioned by the race degeneration theories of French scholar Gustave Le Bon, they believed in the importance of maintaining racial purity in order to preclude the supposed decline that occurs through interbreeding.

As a result, they were not well-disposed toward Jews, never mind blacks.

The U.S. military attache in Poland in the early 1920s, Hugh Gibson, compared Polish Jews with African Americans. He also claimed that the American Joint Distribution Committee, a relief agency, exaggerated the frequency of pogroms in Poland so as to turn America against Poland.

According to Bendersky, U.S. military attaches throughout Europe were generally opposed to Jewish immigration on the grounds that Jews were clannish, unassimilable and disloyal.

Reporting from Palestine in 1925, Col. Robert Foy, the U.S. attache based in Turkey, wrote ominously of "the rising tide of Zionism." Although he wrote glowingly of the Jewish settlements he had visited, Foy observed that "the majority of the immigrants [in Palestine] are Jews from Poland, Roumania and Russia, the most repulsive form of humanity."

Albert Wedemeyer, an attache in Berlin during the Nazi era and a future deputy chief of staff, was just as dismissive of Jews. Claiming that the media exaggerated Hitler's anti-Semitic policies, he said that Jews had historically displayed abrasive and selfish traits that rendered them eternally "suspect or distasteful."

Bendersky claims that the army did not cooperate with the War Refugee Board, which was established by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1944 to rescue Jews imperilled by Nazism. As the deputy chief of staff, Gen. Joseph McNarney, put it: "We must constantly bear in mind… that the most effective relief which can be given victims of enemy persecution is to ensure the speedy defeat of the Axis."

The army dismissed requests to bomb the railroad line to the Auschwitz concentration camp, explaining that scarce resources could not be diverted from the war effort. Yet U.S. aircraft bombed rail lines and industrial facilities very close to Auschwitz.

In the same spirit, the army's major publication, Stars and Stripes, published stories of Nazi concentration camps with hardly a word about their Jewish inmates.

Officers who liberated these camps showed compassion, but, by the same token, brought their prejudices to Jewish displaced persons. Patton set the tone. In Nazi terminology, he described Jewish DPs as "animals" and "a subhuman species…" After the war, many officers voiced opposition to Jewish immigration. But in general, president Harry S. Truman disregarded their qualms.

In deference to Arab opinion, U.S. officers invariably expressed doubts about partitioning Palestine into Jewish and Arab states. Gen. Marshall, the U.S. secretary of state from 1947 to 1949, argued against U.S. recognition of Israel. In a heated exchange with Truman, he accused the president of ignoring U.S. national interests for no other reason than to win New York Jewish votes in an upcoming election.

Albert Wedemeyer

Gen. MacArthur's chief of intelligence in occupied Japan, Gen. Charles Willoughby, became a champion of Israel after the 1956 Sinai war. From a geopolitical perspective, he considered Israel as a viable bulwark against Soviet penetration of the Middle East. Later, he said that Jews had a legitimate moral claim to Palestine.

Yet Willoughby was a racist who frequented circles that often denigrated Jews. Once, he complained to MacArthur that Patton had been removed from his command "at the behest of [U.S. Supreme Court Justice Felix] Frankfurter, Bnai Brith and the Jewish conspirators."

Willoughby's colleague, Marine general Pedro del Valle, believed Jews were incapable of being good Americans because the United States was an inherently Christian nation. Del Valle hewed to the conspiracy theory that America's major political parties were manipulated by an "invisible government" of international Jewish bankers.

Bendersky suggests that such views are no longer common or respectable in the military, having been banished from polite discourse by a variety of factors, ranging from America's war against Nazism to the shocking truth about the Holocaust.

Nevertheless, he warns, overt manifestations of racism have given way to more subtle forms of prejudice.

Still and all, as images from last year's war in Iraq suggest, the U.S. army is the most racially integrated institution in American society today, a far cry from the past.

Toronto-Israel: a powerful partnership

Partnership 2000: Building a living bridge

Since1987, Toronto's Jewish community has twinned with the Israeli city of Eilat and the surrounding region of Eilot under the Partnership 2000 (P2K) program, supported by Jewish Federations across North America. A portion of the funds raised through UJA Federation's annual campaigns is directed towards educational, social, and therapeutic projects in Eilat/Eilot. But P2K is about more than just programs, it's about people. This initiative represents the concept of Gesher Chai, which literally means "Living Bridge," designed to develop professional and personal connections between the people of Eilat/Eilot and the people of Jewish Toronto. The images and stories on this page represent some of the recent Partnership 2000 activities that have touched the lives of both Israelis and Canadians and have helped to build that Living Bridge.

Experiencing the Toronto-Eilat partnership first-hand

Close to 150 Torontonians made their way to Eilat and nearby Eilot region this winter to bring to life the philosophy behind Partnership 2000 (P2K): strong ties that build living bridges between Toronto and Israel.

Members of the UJA Federation Adult Volunteer Mission spent an unforgettable Chanukah in Israel where they were guests of the Sitar Indian Jewish community. Participants on the adult volunteer program also helped out at Eilat's Collier Centre, which caters to many seniors in the area; the Children's Centre of Science and Technology; the Yad Bamidbar (Holocaust) Centre; an Orr Shalom group home for children at risk; and the Arava Institute, which specializes in conservation and environmental protection

"It was the experience of a lifetime to be able to work hands-on, side by side with our Israeli counterparts," says participant Judi Sporn. "This is a true partnership between Eilat/Eilot and Toronto – we learn so much from these incredible people who teach us so much about strength, courage and compassion. Eilat is a beautiful city, but it is a city in need and through the Partnership 2000 program, Toronto is helping to fill that need. I think the experience gave us all a new respect for volunteerism in general, and, of course, for those living in Israel."

Eighteen Toronto families – 70 people in all – comprising the UJA Federation P2K Family Mission - also volunteered at various Eilat-Eilot agencies.

"Everybody on the mission was so proud to be Eilat's partner," says Howie Cumer, chair of the Family Mission. "This was just an incredible experience for all of us. While we do what we can to help the Israelis, what we get in return is phenomenal. They are generous and loving people who teach us something new every day."

In November, members of UJA Federation's Young Leadership Division (YAD) brought English reading materials to Eilat's young leaders, who then sorted and organized the books for local distribution.

Also this winter, 19 students from Hillel of Greater Toronto attended an intensive two-week Israel advocacy and Jewish community leadership program in Israel, followed by three full days of learning and volunteering in the Eliat-Eilot region.

Students got a first-hand look at, among other initiatives, the new environmental awareness and regional recycling projects at Kibbutz Lotan. "The kibbutz was a prime example of the advancement of Israeli society," says participant David Machlis, a third year student at York University. "It gave us all the more reason to advocate for a country that holds such significant values."

From December 22 to January 2, a dozen members of Toronto's First Narayever Congregation also familiarized themselves with P2K.

"The sightseeing we did to turn us into ambassadors for the Eilat/Eilot area was awe-inspiring," says participant Julia Gluck. "The desert is so beautiful. The Red Canyon, Timna and Chai-Bar Reserve were three highlights for me - the jeep ride was pretty exciting and our kids loved it."

Brightening the lives of Israeli patients

The quality of life for patients at Eilat's Josephtal Hospital has improved with the purchase of televisions through funding from Toronto's Jewish community.

The need for hospital entertainment was discovered this past summer as 34 teachers from the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education traveled to Eilat to meet with members of Eilat's Young Leadership.

"When we found out that the hospital had no quality entertainment for patients to take their minds off their pain, we decided that it was unacceptable," says Dr. Uri Koren, Director of Education at Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Ten Toronto day and supplementary schools got into the act with various fundraising projects. For three weeks in November there were student marches, door-to-door collections, and many other events to raise money.

"I went back with a couple of other teachers at Christmas and presented a cheque for $31,000 to Dr. Epstein, the hospital's director," says Koren.

Many of the Toronto students involved in the television project are still in touch with their Israel counterparts today.

"The sense of accomplishment was second to none," adds Koren. "This was a wonderful way to connect children with Israel and with tzedakah, for the purpose of tikun olam (healing the world). It's a wonderful package of all the Jewish values together that we want our children to learn."

The Toronto P2K delegation presented a hand-made quilt to Eilat's Josephtal Hospital which now hangs in the main lobby.

Toronto-Israel: a powerful partnership

Toronto students create a global Passover seder

This Passover, members of Kishinev's Jewish community will be celebrating at the Seder table with special guests from Toronto and the city's Partnership 2000 region of Eilat-Eilot.

For the third consecutive year, students from Hillel of Greater Toronto representing York University, the University of Toronto, and Ryerson University, will be making a Passover trek to the 1,000-year-old capital of Moldova in the former Soviet Union, together with their counterparts from Eilat-Eilot.

"The Kishinev Pesach Project gives our students an incredible opportunity to interact with other Jewish students from Israel and the FSU, all of whom come together for one common goal – bettering Jewish lives," says Lisa Isen Baumal, Director, Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life – a UJA Federation Jewish Toronto Tomorrow project at the University of Toronto. Isen Baumal traveled with the group in 2002 and 2003, and is helping to organize this year's sojourn.

After arriving in Kishinev, a few days before Passover, the students will take part in an intensive schedule which includes meetings with representatives of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), a tour of Jewish cultural and community centres, visits to homes for the elderly and the disabled, and finally, Pesach seder celebrations for members of 30 Kishinev households.

"The Toronto students learn a lot about themselves as Jews, including how much they might take for granted living in a strong Jewish community like Toronto," says Isen Baumal. "Many come over here convinced that they're going to teach Kishinev Jewry about Pesach, but we often benefit from the experience more. By watching the incredible efforts of the Kishinev students, they learn just how much of a difference young Jewish adults can make in their own communities."

"The Jewish community in Moldova is a fantastic one," says Jenny Herbert, a University of Toronto student. "Its students, with whom we spent the majority of our time, are deeply committed to their Judaism. It was amazing to see their enthusiasm for a religion and culture that is relatively new to them. It was really inspiring to see how they have built their community. The trip was a great opportunity to connect to a different part of the global Jewish community, especially through the celebration of Pesach, the holiday that celebrates our freedom."

In April 2003, Kishinev residents gathered to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the infamous pogrom that devastated the city's Jewish community when, on Easter Sunday in 1903, mobs killed 50 Jews, wounded 500, looted over 1,000 Jewish homes and left 2,000 Jewish families homeless. Before the pogrom, half of Kishinev's 125,000 residents were Jewish. Today, the Jewish populace of Kishinev stands at 25,000.

UJA Federation has been actively involved in the revitalization and growth of the Kishinev Jewish community.

College caters to special needs

Northern Israel's Tel-Hai College has become a role model for working with post-secondary students who have special learning needs.

Nearly 250 of the college's 1,600 students are struggling with learning disabilities, but special mentoring programs at the school allow young adults to graduate from a respected post-secondary institution.

"Many of these students were treated in school as retarded," says college president, Professor Motti Shechter. "We're trying to rebuild their self-esteem. Tel-Hai is a model for the entire country."

Students with learning disabilities and intellectually gifted young adults join the rest of the student body in specialized courses, such as economics and management, computer science, nutritional science, social work and biotechnology.

The school – northern Israel's only accredited academic college and supported in part by Canadian Jewish Federations – accommodates 1,600 full-time students, with plans to build a second campus so that 2,700 students can take advantage of Tel-Hai's unique academic offerings.

"Most students come from outside the area," notes Shechter. "They want to be far away from the central section of the country. They're socially conscious and they're environmentally conscious."

With Israeli Arabs and other minorities making up 10% of the student population, external relations and development director, Sagi Melamed, points to a "unique coexistence" and a "special spirit" at Tel-Hai.

The college is situated in a region to which UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has strongly contributed. The nearby Posluns Youth Hostel, also at Tel-Hai, offers sleeping space and educational facilities for Israeli and overseas school groups and the Granovsky auditorium – northern Israel's predominant cultural centre - in nearby Kiryat Shmona attracts some of Israel's top performers.

An important priority of Tel-Hai College is contributing to local northern communities. With that objective in mind, the college has begun a women's leadership program in Kiryat Shmona and a course for middle managers in the area, in addition to organizing conferences on water resources and other issues of urgent concern to northern Israeli residents.

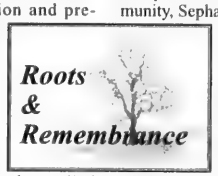
Sephardi Jews in early Canada

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN



One of the most interesting and unusual items pertaining to the Jewish history of Confederation and pre-Confederation Canada is a two-centuries-old diary in the custody of the National Archives of Canada.

The diary belonged to Samuel Jacobs, a European merchant whose ship Betsy was known to have plied the St. Lawrence River carrying trade goods from Quebec to Portugal even before the British victory over the French on the Plains of Abraham in 1759.

A well-educated man who knew English and French as well as Yiddish and Hebrew, Jacobs wrote some entries in his diary "in phonetic English and French written in the cursive Ashkenazi Hebrew script," according to the late demographer-historian Louis Rosenberg.

A former research director of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Rosenberg mentioned the diary in a 1960 treatise, Some Aspects of the Historical Development of the Canadian Jewish Community, to illustrate an important point. It was his contention that, despite an assumption by many historians to the contrary, Jacobs and many other early Jewish traders in British North America were of Ashkenazi, not Sephardi, origin.

Regarding the United States, historians had long accepted three successive strata of Jewish immigration – Spanish-Portuguese, German and eastern European. In the American Jewish community, Sephardim had been dominant from roughly 1754 to 1840, Germans from 1841 to 1920 and eastern Europeans concurrently from 1881 (1852 in some versions) to 1921.

Even though many Jews with Spanish- and Portuguese-sounding names were among Canada's earliest settlers, Rosenberg challenged pioneer historian Clarence de Sola's assumption that early Sephardi Jews left a permanent mark on Canadian Jewish culture.

As Rosenberg noted, it was de Sola who said most of the early members of the Montreal's Shearith Israel Congregation, established 1768, were Sephardi. Succeeding generations of historians "have accepted that statement unquestioningly, and have repeated or paraphrased it so frequently that it is now generally assumed that the majority of Canada's earliest Jewish inhabitants really were the descendants of Spanish and Portuguese Jews," he observed.

But Rosenberg said early Jewish arrivals with Spanish- and Portuguese-sounding names such as Jacob de Maurera, Elias Seixas, Fernandez de Fonseca, Joseph Bindona, Emanuel de Cordova, Isaac Miranda, Hananiel Garca, Uriel Moresco and Manuel Gomez, did not settle here permanently.

"Many married non-Jews and left the Jewish community or returned to New York, Philadelphia or Newport, whence they had come, before the Shearith Israel congregation was founded in 1768," he wrote.

Many later Jewish immigrants were mistaken for Sephardi because of their association with Shearith Israel, yet only one of 20 members mentioned in minute books between 1778 and 1780 was Sephardi, Rosenberg found. Most later Jewish arrivals, including the famous Hart family of Trois Rivières, were of Ashkenazi origin, he noted.

The first Sephardi Jew to settle here permanently? According to Rosenberg, it was none other than Rabbi Abraham de Sola, the synagogue's famed spiritual leader who assumed the post in 1847.

"So much for the legend of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews who are alleged to have been the earliest settlers in Canada and to have been the majority among the founders of the Spanish and Portuguese congregation in Montreal," he wrote.

Contemporary historians who wish to challenge this conclusion would be hard pressed to find even one Jewish family that can boast of Sephardi roots going back into British North America before 1800.

Let the world see

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Subsequent to the latest bombing on Jan. 29, the Israeli government has taken a drastic turn in its usual response. What was once sensitive, internal and classified video footage, has now been released into cyberspace. By simply clicking (and this is definitely not a recommendation) onto http://switch3.castup.net/cunet/gm.asp?format=wm&s=C9CE3CEBD341410FACBEFAABD8F66FE0&ci=22958&ak=null&ClipMediaID=28654, one may access and visualize a most graphic and horrific vision. In just the few days following the deadly attack, more than one million viewers worldwide have visited this gruesome site, and the count continues.

This was a very difficult and painful decision indeed. It represents a total reversal of a long-standing policy. Until now, it was correctly decided that as much of the dignity and honour of the victims of terror was to be salvaged as possible. The greatest amount of sensitivity for the surviving families was to be accorded. As well, it was felt that the viewing of such images would cause needless panic in the everyday lives of Israelis and be a source of depression and despair. It was felt that these images would further deter world Jewry from visiting Israel.

All this has now changed.

The reason for this is the propaganda onslaught initiated by the State of Israel in response to the United Nations' opposition to the separation fence. The days are drawing close to the upcoming hearing on the legality of this wall being built to protect the citizens of Israel precisely from such terrorist atrocities.

Let the world see for themselves the reality of suicide bombings, Israel has decided. Let people try to comprehend the senseless killing, maiming and destruction of families.

Reportedly, even the gentle and respected members of the ZAKA organization, whose grim but sacred task it is to collect body parts off of trees and rooftops, are co-ordinating their efforts to transport the charred and mangled wreckage of the number 19 bus to The Hague for all to see.

More than 30 countries – most of the democracies of the world including Canada – have petitioned the International Court of Justice against this hearing in The Hague, arguing that this is a not a legal issue, but rather a political one.

In the UN's insistence on looking at the issue, it reveals its hypocrisy and double standard.

When The Hague could be serving the civility of mankind and the advancement of society by declaring the suicide bombings of civilians a crime against humanity, it is instead allowing itself to be manipulated by anti-Semitic, anti-Israel sentiments.

The likelihood that the court will back down is small. Whether or not they rule on the "legality" of the fence will in any case be an unbinding decision. What will remain as a fact will be that the State of Israel will do everything in its power to protect its citizens.

Two books debunk Protocol myths

Dismantling the Big Lie: The Protocols of the Elders of Zion*, by Steven L. Jacobs & Mark Weitzman, KTAV Publishing House Inc., $18.95.

A Rumor About the Jews: Anti-Semitism, Conspiracy and the Protocols of Zion*, by Stephen Eric Bronner, Oxford University Press, $23.50.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion are the supposed minutes from a congress held by representatives from the "Twelve Tribes of Israel," led by a grand rabbi whose purpose was to plan the conquest of the world.

This congress, of course, never took place. The pamphlet is actually a crude forgery created by the secret police of imperial Russia. It first appeared in 1903 and it incorporates many of the most vicious myths about Jews handed down over the centuries.

The Nazis made it required reading. It still serves as a staple for numerous fundamentalist, conservative, neo-fascist and anti-Semitic groups in the United States and throughout the world.

Unbelievably, the Protocols are achieving new popularity. A 41-part series on Egyptian television, Horse without a Horseman (2002), presented a history of the Middle East from 1855 through 1917.

This work of hatred celebrated the existence of a Jewish conspiracy, and included scenes of the "elders of Zion" plotting their strategy and the supposed discovery of the Protocols.

Dismantling the Big Lie, co-published by the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles, is the first work to refute, in a detailed and specific fashion, the spurious claims of the Protocols. Each of the 24 protocols is examined and then disproved by showing how Judaism's teachings and practices have addressed the issues in question.

In A Rumor about the Jews, Bronner, a professor of political science at Rutgers University, also debunks the claims made in the Protocols and discusses their widespread and pernicious influence.

"There were great industrialists like Henry Ford, who sponsored its American publication," he writes. "There were important figures like Ezra Pound and Louis-Ferdinand Celine, artistic innovators and political fools, who embraced its central thesis. And there was also, of course, Hitler himself who sought to implement its practical implications."

Bronner's book examines the roots of the Protocols' hateful ideology and looks at contemporary anti-Semitism. Many readers will deplore Bronner's attack on what he feels is the extremism of some supporters of the State of Israel.

"Advocacy organizations like the World Jewish Congress, the American- Israel Public Affairs Committee and the Anti-Defamation League, which trumpet every mention of the Protocols and consider every criticism of Israel tantamount to anti-Semitism, are producing their own version of 'blowback.'"

Bronner makes clear that Israel is a nation with the seventh strongest military on the planet and is the dominant power in the Middle East. It is the recipient of more than $4 billion (US) in aid annually and is the new darling of the Christian Coalition. Israeli settlements, populated primarily by rabid Zionists and religious zealots, dot the West Bank and discriminatory policies have been implemented with respect to its own growing Arab citizenry.

Both these refutations of the Protocols should reach a large audience. But one must wonder: why should Bronner's antagonism to some aspects of Israeli policy find a place in an unrelated work?

Judaism and the environment

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Is it a mitzvah to be green? Is it a sin to wear fur? And what should we do with used yahrzeit candles? The Torah teaches hundreds of commandments, customs and traditions. But is caring for our environment among them? Today, a look at Judaism and the environment.

Although Judaism has many commandments that require a respect for nature, one famous verse may seem to imply otherwise. In Genesis 1:28, we are told to "be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth and subdue it; have dominion over… every living thing" [http://makeashorterlink.com/?W2FE61747].

Rabbi Saul Berman of Yeshiva University says the real problem "has nothing to do with people's excessive observance of the command of 'subdue it!'… The real problem is the "human failure to heed religious teachings about the exclusive importance of material goals… Only such a reorientation, in which material excess is replaced with deep spiritual awareness of the ultimate partnership between humanity and the Earth in the achievement of God's goals, can lay the foundation for a new and more healthy relationship between us and our environment" [www.us-israel.org/jsource/Environment/berman.html].

In "How Green is Judaism?" the University of California's David Vogel looks at some of Judaism's key beliefs about nature and explains what seem at first to be contradictions in the law. Why does Judaism prohibit cutting down fruit-bearing trees when waging a war, but allow other trees to be cut down? Vogel says these laws illustrate the middle path that Judaism takes toward the environment.

"God does not want us to live in a world in which we are forbidden to chop down all trees since such a prohibition would make the preservation and sustaining of human life impossible. At the same time, neither does God want us to assume that the entire world exists to satisfy our material needs" [http://faculty.haas.berkeley.edu/vogel/judaism.pdf].

Speaking of trees, Britain's Noah Project has put together some thought-provoking quotes about trees, some of which surprise you [www.noahproject.org.uk/Education/education.html]:

• If a man kills a tree before its time, it is as though he has murdered a soul. (Rabbi Nahman of Bratzlav)

• If someone is studying as he walks along the road and interrupts his study and exclaims: "How lovely is that tree! How lovely is this field!" Scripture considers that he had harmed his own soul. (Rabbi Jacob, Pirkei Avot 3:9)

• If you're planting a tree and you hear the Messiah has come, first finish planting and then run to the city gates to tell him, "Shalom" (Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai).

From trees, let's turn to fur. Richard Schwartz and Dovid Sears ask if fur is a "Jewish issue." They point to the many examples of concern that our ancestors had for animal welfare. "Rebecca was judged suitable to be a wife of the patriarch Isaac because of her kindness in watering the ten camels of Eliezer, Abraham's servant." While "Judaism puts human beings on a higher level than animals and indicates that animals may be harmed and even killed if an essential human need is met," Schwartz and Sears wonder if wearing fur falls in that category [www.ivu.org/jvs/].

For more about Judaism and the environment, visit the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life (COEJL) website. COEJL is one of the most active organizations that works to convince Jews to live a greener lifestyle. Its participating groups include Hadassah, the Orthodox Union, the Jewish War Veterans and the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association [www.coejl.org/].

Earlier, I asked what we should do with used yahrzeit glasses. Would reusing them as drinking glasses be considered sacrilegious? Or just a bit ghoulish? Rabbi Binyomin Adilman says reusing them would actually be a wonderful deed. He says the Jewish concept of "recycling" dates to the time of the Gemarah. Rather than throw away articles that were used to perform mitzvot, Judaism has always encouraged their reuse. For example, a lulav isn't just thrown away, but is kept to be use fuel to burn chametz for Passover. An etrog is poked full of cloves and used as a fragrance during the Saturday night Havdalah service. The chupah from a wedding ceremony becomes the groom's tallit. Even leftover challah is used to make a kugel for the following Shabbat.

Rabbi Adilman says using yahrzeit glasses as drinking glasses should not be considered macabre. Rather, it is a wonderful way to encourage us to use these objects for another mitzvah as we fill them with a drink and thank God with a blessing [www.us-israel.org/jsource/Judaism/jenvttoc.html].

New speakers group seeks to garner support for Israel among non-Jews

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Organizers of the Speakers Action Group, a new grassroots organization, hopes to gain support for Israel from the mainstream non-Jewish community.

Shirley-Anne Haber and Joan O'Callaghan started the group after meeting at a conference sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee that looked at how Canadians view Israel.

"We found it disturbing to [learn] that many Canadians do not understand that Israel is a democracy. We decided that we had to find a way to set the record straight," said Haber, head of Media Action Group, an e-mail service that sends out information on current events in Israel to about 1,500 people on the list.

"My husband believed in fighting for what was right, and that become my credo," said O'Callaghan, an instructor at Ontario Institute of Studies in Education (OISE) and wife of the late J. Patrick O'Callaghan, former publisher of such papers as the Calgary Herald and the Windsor Star.

Haber and O'Callaghan met with John Thompson, president of the MacKenzie Institute, which conducts research and provides commentary on matters pertaining to organized violence and political instability, and Ted Belman, editor of IsraPundit, a website that covers news and views on the Arab war on Israel.

Together, they devised a roster of about 40 Jewish and non-Jewish speakers who will go out and speak, at no charge, to groups or at seminars.

"They all feel that Israel needs our support and that the media is often one-sided. We will work with the groups to help choose a speaker and theme,"said Haber.

"Our goal is to find non-Jewish venues because we need the support of the larger community who, for the most part, have little understanding of the Jewish people. They do not realize how important Jerusalem is to us, and they do not see how Israel is suffering.

"Israel is seen as the powerful country, and the Palestinians are seen as suffering. The media has done a job in pushing the [idea] of David and Goliath.

"We have devised a way to approach non-Jews in an intelligent way and we're waiting for a breakthrough. We are encouraging people to contact us if they know of any church group or service club that many want a speaker."

Some of the group's speakers include Thompson; Rev. Peter Gilbert of the Christian Jewish Dialogue; Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Tom Kaye, chief of police in Owen Sound, who has undergone specialized anti-terrorism training at the Georgia International Law Enforcement Exchange and in Israel; Majed El Shafie, president of the One Free World Ministry; Rev. Walter Kelly, who has studied in Israel and speaks Hebrew; Len Rudner, director of community relations for CJC, Ontario region; and Rev. John Howard, who has toured Israel five times and is a student of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

"This is something that needs to be done. There is nothing worse than feeling hopeless. We both feel an energy for trying to get something done," said O'Callaghan.

CASH FOR ZAKA: Students in grades 4 to 8 at Or HaEmet Day School raised $2,400 for Zaka Rescue and Recovery by memorizing 352 chapters of Tehillim, 871 Mishnayot and 430 lines of Gemarah in honour of terror victims in Israel. A ceremony honouring Zaka took place at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, where Zaka representatives Marshal Shapiro and Yisroel Meir Stefansky were presented with a life-size cheque. Zaka was founded in 1995 to co-ordinate the activities of volunteers who respond to emergencies in Israel.

Chabad Lubavitch opens new Markham mikvah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The new mikvah at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham is a far cry from the frozen Siberian lake used by the grandmother of the synagogue's rebbitzen to prepare for her marriage many years ago.

At the recent opening of the synagogue's elegant new mikvah for women, Goldie Plotkin told of her bubbie's trek to Siberia, where Plotkin's grandfather had been sent to build yeshivot. "My bubbie was not going to get married without going to a mikvah," she said. "She cracked a hole in the freezing lake and that was her mikvah."

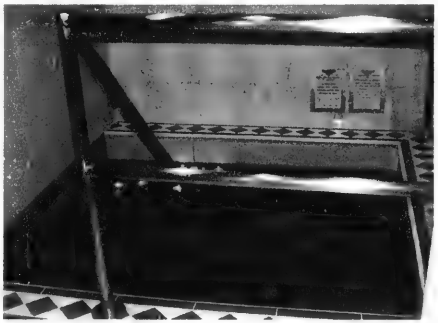
Plotkin, the driving force behind the creation of the new ritual bath at her synagogue, proudly showed the tastefully appointed waiting room and change rooms – complete with soft paint colours, marble walls and floor, scented candles and plush white terry robes and towels – to an estimated 250 congregants and visitors.

The mikvah, which serves mostly brides and married women, is open by appointment only, noted Plotkin, who teaches classes for brides. "It's very discreet."

In addition to the small ritual immersion pool, there is a mikvah in another room for kashering dishes.

The mikvah ritual is a celebration of life, said Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, the congregation's spiritual leader. "A kallah, before she gets married and enters into building a Jewish home, goes to the mikvah. A convert joining the faith of Judaism – being born spiritually, so to speak – goes to the mikvah. It is the tradition of Judaism that most underscores the value of life. Water gives life."

Tammy Levy, left, a nursery teacher at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, discusses the synagogue's new mikvah with visitors as they stand at the railing overlooking the ritual immersion bath, shown left. [Frances Kraft photos]



According to keynote speaker Bronya Shaffer, a Brooklyn-based chassidic lecturer on Jewish women's issues, a mikvah is an "agent of transformation" from the spiritual category of tumah ("impurity") to taharah ("purity"). The words used in English are not equivalents, she stressed, and there is no judgment implied.

Menstruation is a source of tumah, the mother of 10 explained, "because we recognize there's a potential for life, and that loss of potential for life creates tumah.

"The mitzvah of marriage is compatible only with a category of spiritual taharah," Shaffer said. Sexual intercourse is prohibited by Jewish law during the time of tumah, she explained.

Referring to a concept in the Gemarah known as protecting the mitzvah, Shaffer noted "a whole list of behaviours" that observant couples refrain from during the period of tumah, from the time menstruation begins until seven days after it stops. Even a quick hug or a kiss on the cheek is not permitted, she said.

"The Gemarah says no, because you want to be so careful not to transgress that core mitzvah… you should not even touch fingertips during this time."

Physical contact is a basic need, Shaffer said, but "creating a relationship of intimacy means there's all those other facets we have to develop aside from the physical avenues of expression."

A mikvah is considered so critical to the existence of Jewish life that it takes precedence over acquiring a Sefer Torah if a community has funds only for one or the other, Shaffer said.

The mikvah is an "experience of holiness," she said. Recalling an interview she gave for a photojournalistic display called the "Mikvah Project," Shaffer said she found herself crying as she tried to describe the experience. "It's me and God. Nothing else exists."

Don't be afraid to ask for things, says Erica Ehm

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Success, says Erica Ehm, is not about making a lot of money. It's about making your dreams come true.

A songwriter, actor and author who rose to fame as MuchMusic's first female host, Ehm spoke recently at the kickoff event for Breakfast With Bigshots, a three-part Sunday morning inspirational speaker series. The events are an initiative of Reviving Eden, an offshoot of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning geared to young adults in their 30s and 40s.

As a child in Montreal, Ehm said, she aspired to become a teacher and was passionate about theatre. "On MuchMusic, I was teaching about music," she said. In a way, she was also acting. "You saw mostly the real me, but you were [also] seeing the facade of me. Here you'll get to know me a little bit more."

Ehm – whose recent projects include her book She Should Talk: Conversations with Exceptional Women about Life, Dreams and Success, contributing to What's Up Kids magazine and writing the children's musical theatre production Caillou's Big Party – confessed that she leads "somewhat of a dual life these days," spending most of her time in sweatpants taking care of her three-year-old son and infant daughter.

Especially now that she leads a lower-profile life, Ehm realizes the importance of taking initiative. "So few people ask me to do anything," she said, referring to professional opportunities. Nobody invited her to be a judge on the television show Popstars The One, she noted. Ehm landed that herself by calling the producer.

When Ehm was just eight, her mother – Evelyn Hannon, founder, as a middle-aged divorced woman, of the hugely successful travel website Journeywoman – taught her not to be afraid to ask for things. One evening, Hannon insisted that her reluctant daughter order pizza, or there would be no dinner. The positive result "had a really big impact on me," Ehm said. "Don't be afraid to ask for things. The worst thing that can happen is that people will say no."

Erica Ehm

Among the things she went on to ask for was a part-time job at a local radio station when she was 17. The program director hired her as music librarian, providing her with records and concert tickets in lieu of salary.

Along the way to MuchMusic, Ehm acquired a degree in communications, worked in record stores, answered phones at CityTV and hosted cable television shows.

"Every opportunity and skill you acquire – it's all going to add up. Each one will give you skills to apply to your next position. You've always got to build a strong foundation."

Both personally and professionally, Ehm believes in not letting fear stop her. She called the blind date she went on with her husband, Terry Moshenberg, "uncomfortable, scary and potentially disastrous." Neither of them was looking to be set up, but a chance encounter between Moshenberg and a persistent Jewish matchmaker – who happened to have met Ehm's mother – set them on a different course.

When Moshenberg described the type of woman he'd be interested in – athletic, career oriented and into music – she realized the qualities described Ehm. Moshenberg said, "If you can get me a date with Erica Ehm, I'm in."

Ehm's attitude has been affected by Paulo Coelho's book The Alchemist, which deals in part with being able to recognize opportunities. "I'm always looking for something magical to happen, but you have to see [those opportunities] and react to them. Otherwise they pass you by," she said.

Her marriage and the birth of her children prompted her to take a closer look at the role Judaism plays in her life. Ehm (née Miechowsky – Ehm being an acronym made up of her mother's initials) spent her childhood in the heavily Jewish suburb of Cote St. Luc before moving to Hudson, Que., where there were no other Jewish families.

The move was motivated by Ehm's father George, who survived the Holocaust as a hidden child, and left a successful career when he was in his 30s to take up horse dressage. "He literally made his dream come true," Ehm said.

"My nickname was La Juive [the Jewess], but it wasn't derogatory," she said. Although she sometimes felt "like a tourist" when she was invited to celebrate Christmas with friends, the experience was "great for me… It made me comfortable in other people's worlds."

Ehm's Jewishness, however, plays "a very defining part" in who she is, although she is "not very educated about Judaism per se."

Because of her beliefs about equality between men and women, Ehm had felt "disassociated" from certain aspects of Judaism. "Luckily there's egalitarianism," she said, adding that her concerns were washed away by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, who officiated at her wedding.

More recently, she has become aware of the importance of making her son feel Jewish. "It's not such a loud part of who we are," she said. "I have to rediscover my heritage so I can pass it on… That's part of reinventing myself, finding a new piece of the puzzle."

LITERACY DAY: Students and staff at USDS Bayview recently celebrated Family Literacy Day at a special lunch with representatives of the Tikun Chaim initiative of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE), a program that offers educational support to Jewish children in Toronto. At the lunch, the first meeting of the BJE Reading Initiative, educators and students shared ideas on how to encourage children to read. Seen are, back row, from left, USDS librarian Gilda Iron, principal Donna Cassels and librarian Norma Appelton; front row, from left, Grade 4 students Michelle Soicher, Jacob Shapiro and Shira Levine. Children who wish to become involved in the Reading Initiative can contact the BJE's Shula Strassfeld at sstrassfeld@ujafed.org.

Community leaders react to Supreme Court decision

"It also has many potentially negative consequences, ranging from poor quality parent/child relationships to abusive child-rearing practices."

Non-violent child-rearing practices have proven effective in promoting learning, self-discipline and positive parent/child relationships, he says. "Effective discipline within families and educational institutions can be achieved without physical punishment."

Bernstein has mixed feelings about the decision.

"While disappointed that the section was not struck down, I am pleased that the meaning of 'reasonable under the circumstances' has been narrowed beyond what was set down by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

"[It is a step] forward to have a consistent and uniform standard for parents and teachers across Canada."

"My detractors would say that it is going to promote hatred. I disagree," Gibson said of the film. "I think that's utter nonsense. The absurdity of that staggers me."

The Times reports that the Reader's Digest interview, in the magazine's March issue, is bound to raise more hackles among Jews because of Gibson's waffling on Jewish suffering during the Holocaust.

The Times has been critical of Gibson and the film, noting the actor and director belongs to a highly conservative Catholic fringe sect that disowns the teachings of the Second Vatican Council, which absolved Jews of the charge of deicide and said it must never be used against them.

Meanwhile, WorldNetDaily.com has reported that Gibson, in an effort to defuse accusations the film would fuel anti-Semitism, agreed to scroll the following words across the screen after the final scene: "During the Roman occupation, over 250,000 Jews were crucified by the Romans, but only one rose from the dead."

Despite the heated words and rumours over the past year, Singer, of CJC, said he doesn't believe the movie will set back Jewish-Christian relations.

"Even if the [final version] portrays Jews negatively, I don't think it will hurt relations in the long run."

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce

The Sixth Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit any of their works of unpublished, original fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. The fiction should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions
no later than February 27, 2004 at:
North York, Ontario M3B 3K4.

If you want us to return the submissions, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so. The editor.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our tenth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2004 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, February 13, 2004. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 27, 2004.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 4, 2004. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Media must look past emotional rhetoric about the fence

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Israel's security fence continues to come under intense media scrutiny in the lead-up to the hearings at the International Court of Justice (ICJ) on Feb. 23. Many of the arguments about the alleged illegality of the fence come from the Palestinians and their supporters, who are determined to use the ICJ proceedings to isolate and de-legitimize Israel. Therefore, it's important for journalists covering this controversial issue to understand all aspects of this heated debate.

One persistent argument is that the fence should have been built only on Israel's side of the Green Line that separates pre-1967 Israel from the West Bank. Those who endorse this view ignore the fact that the Green Line is not an internationally recognized boundary. Rather, it was set up in 1949 as an armistice line to implement a ceasefire between Israel and the invading Arab armies – foremost the Jordanian troops who had seized and occupied the West Bank. The disposition of forces left Israel's heartland severely vulnerable to attack. UN Security Council Resolution 242 (of November 1967) recognized this fact when it explicitly recommended Israel's redeployment from territories – not the territories – in exchange for peace within secure and recognized boundaries.

Certainly since the Camp David peace talks in 2000, many analysts have asserted that the Green Line will serve as the starting point for negotiations about the future political border between Israel and a Palestinian state. It is generally understood by everyone except many Arabs – and especially the Palestinian Authority under its president, Yasser Arafat – that there should be adjustments to the Green Line to reflect political and demographic realities.

Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak recently noted that not only is Israel not required to build the fence solely on its side of the Green Line, but to do so would be to accept the line as a permanent border. This would leave Israel with no "bargaining chips" to motivate Palestinians to compromise at the negotiating table.

Another incessantly repeated argument against the fence is that it represents a "land grab." However, in reality, the security fence, where it is located on land east of the Green Line, can be altered if future political negotiations deem it necessary. Even Israeli moderates say the fence's route is vital to Israel's security and long-term negotiating interests.

Finally, the media should take a closer look at the inherent inconsistencies in the Palestinian position. As Barry Rubin argued in "Fencing out the terrorists," (National Post, Jan. 26), the Palestinians publicly claim they want a two-state solution. However, having rejected that option at Camp David, they are currently refusing to fulfill their obligations under the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan to disarm and dismantle terrorist organizations. At the same time, they also object to Israel erecting a security fence that will, in effect, advance the idea of a two-state solution.

Why this apparent contradiction? According to Rubin, "the Palestinian leadership's main strategy is based on Israel's population being vulnerable to terrorism… because Yasser Arafat's goal remains the conquest of Israel rather than achieving an independent Palestinian state. A state, in his thinking, can be accepted only if it does not interfere with the continued struggle to get everything."

Unfortunately, writes Rubin, "much of the world has accepted the anti-fence argument." That makes it particularly important for journalists to see beyond the emotional rhetoric – to say nothing of the tremendous impact of TV imagery – directed against Israel's security fence. It is their responsibility to present both sides of the story fully and accurately to their audience.

Concordia film gets thumbs-up

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Discordia, a new National Film Board (NFB) documentary on last year's turmoil at Concordia University, was enthusiastically received at its world premiere by students who seem ready to relegate the period to history.

Last Monday evening, they filled the 650 seats of the downtown campus's H-110 hall, infamous as the place where former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu was to have spoken on Sept. 9, 2002, when the audience was locked in the auditorium while riot police battled demonstrators in the lobby outside. A second screening was added to accommodate the several hundred turned away.

Discordia, made by recent Concordia communications studies graduates Ben Addelman and Samir Mallal, does not go into the politics of the Arab-Israeli conflict or how the university administration or police acted during or after the violence.

Rather, it follows three principal characters over the course of the school year that followed the Netanyahu protest: Hillel co-president Noah Sarna, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) vice-president Samer Elatrash and, most of all, Aaron Maté, a pro-Palestinian Jewish Concordia Student Union (CSU) vice-president. Elatrash and Maté face criminal charges for their role in the violence.

The film, which has no narrator, portrays the three as young people still in formation, suggesting that what the outside world saw as ideological differences, or even hatred, could also be seen as a bunch of (male) hotheads trying to out-shout each other.

The 71-minute film, which was also screened last Tuesday night in Toronto and broadcast last Wednesday on CBC Newsworld, offers behind-the-scenes looks at the machinations of the CSU and attempts at conciliation between Hillel members and supporters of the Palestinians.

The panel discussion that followed the screening, moderated by former CBC Newsworld Counterspin host Avi Lewis, saw the three men sitting together, but not engaging each other directly.

Sarna said that while he found the film generally good and his portrayal in it to be fair, he said there can never be reconciliation as long as Elatrash thinks what happened on Sept. 9, 2002 was a "victory," as he claims in the film.

A website has been set up to allow the discussion to continue at: www.nfb.ca/discordia. It also features out-takes not used in the final edit of more than 200 hours of footage.

The project has the backing of some leading Jewish real-estate developers, as well as academics, members of the museum world, fundraisers and community leaders, he said. One of the project's key visionaries is retired businessman Joshua Ronn.

Robert Libman, the Montreal executive committee member responsible for urban development, said the city is "looking very favourably" upon the idea.

"It's a great project and we hope to see it materialize in the next couple of years."

The downtown site has been vacant or a parking lot for 40 years, Libman said, and a development that recalls the historical significance of the area would be welcome.

He said the city is waiting for the group's final plans, including architectural design and financial feasibility. Once zoning and urban integration details are worked out, the city can decide whether to sell or perhaps even donate the land, he added.

Segal said the idea for a Jewish museum has been talked about for years, but it took off after McGill University professor and author Morton Weinfeld wrote a column in The CJN in February 2000 that pointed out the "crying need" for a major Jewish – not Holocaust – museum in Canada.

Weinfeld proposed a museum with two main components: the basics of Judaism and Jewish history, and the story of Canadian Jews, particularly those in the city or region in which the museum would be located.

Weinfeld, who holds the chair in ethnic studies at McGill University and is an expert on the Canadian Jewish community, is now working on the project.

"I think it's a great idea and long overdue. There are maybe 70 Jewish museums in North America, and others in Europe and Australia," he said. "Montreal and Canada can certainly do it, too."

Segal agrees. "If they have Jewish museums in Tulsa and Cleveland, why can't we?"

Such a museum has an important educational value for both Jews and non-Jews, Weinfeld said.

"Museums are different today. They are not only collections of old artifacts. While preservation is important, they are also dynamic institutions linking the past and present."

The question of what a museum in Montreal would display is still being discussed, and scholars and other experts will be consulted, Segal said.

A $6-million museum at the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre in Cummings House opened last year. A new museum would likely deal with the Holocaust as part of Jewish history, but not in as much depth as the MHMC facility, he said.

Different committees are studying various aspects of the project and the group is looking for wide-ranging input.

"This has to be something the community likes and wants," he said. "It's not a one-man show."

The launching of the Canadian Jewish Virtual Museum and Archives at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in 2002 also helped crystallize the idea for a real museum, Segal said. The Shaar project, supported with a $181,000 Canadian Heritage grant, consists of a website containing a history of Canadian Jewry and a database of community records.

Naomi Kramer, former curator of the virtual museum who has helped to plan the real museum, said the idea of a physical museum was proposed to the federal government at the same time the grant application was made for the virtual museum, she said.

"It's absolutely critical that the community has a central location to house its artifacts," Kramer said. "A lot of organizations have wonderful intentions, but they do not have the resources to preserve what they have properly. A lot is being lost. There is a need for co-ordination. No one knows what the other one has."

She said it is unfortunate that some collections and documents are being donated to non-Jewish institutions.

"Once what we have is dispersed, it essentially becomes part of Canadian history at large. Our story is then told from the outside, not by us from the inside."

A Jewish museum would also provide inspiration to newer generations of immigrants, she said.

McGill intervention for Tannenbaum

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The fact that Elchanan Tannenbaum was able to emerge alive from more than three years of captivity in Lebanon may be attributed to connections made in Montreal through the McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building (MMEP), says its director Jim Torczyner.

The Israeli businessman was kidnapped in October 2000 and held by Hezbollah.

Torczyner said credit should be given to Jordanian Mohammad Al-Hadid, who two months ago was elected president of the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, for working behind the scenes to obtain basic information about Tannenbaum and to secure assurances that he was treated according to the rules of international law.

Al-Hadid became a member of the MMEP's international executive committee about five years ago, when he was president of the Jordanian Red Crescent Society, one of the partner organizations of the MMEP.

Also on that committee is Jimmy Weinblatt, rector of Ben-Gurion University – another MMEP partner – whose son is married to Tannenbaum's daughter.

Weinblatt and Al-Hadid met in Montreal at an MMEP meeting several months after Tannenbaum went missing in Lebanon in October 2000, Torczyner said. Weinblatt was reluctant to ask Al-Hadid for help, and turned to Torczyner who had a personal relationship with Al-Hadid.

Torczyner knew Al-Hadid was open to exchange with Israel. Torczyner had earlier in their relationship arranged for him to meet with the Israeli ambassador in Amman and to visit Israel and make contact with Magen David Adom (MDA), Israel's emergency and blood service.

BAT MITZVAH GIRL HELPS ISRAEL'S WAR DISABLED

Deena Godfrey of Toronto recently celebrated her Bat Mitzvah. In lieu of presents, she asked all her guests to send donations to Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel/Beit Halochem Canada, a cause that is close to her heart. Through the generosity of her family and friends, Deena was able to: 1) fund the childcare program at the Haifa Centre for one year; 2) purchase a specially equipped wheelchair; and 3) sponsor a disabled veteran through Beit Halochem's Scholarship fund.

Beit Halochem Canada is proud to be the recipient of such thoughtfulness, and wishes Deena the very best in all her future endeavours. She is a very special young lady.

Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel/Beit Halochem Canada assists Israel's 50,000 disabled veterans and victims of terror at state-of-the-art rehabilitation facilities in Israel. Should you wish to follow Deena's example, or find out about other sponsorship options, please contact Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel/Beit Halochem Canada at 416-787-8950 or 1-800-355-1648 or by email at info@advi.ca

Apartheid fighter discusses Jewish role in struggle

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Albie Sachs says one of the most emotional moments of his life came in 1989 when he was in Toronto to see a play based on The Jail Diary of Albie Sachs, his account of spending 168 days in solitary confinement in a South African jail in the mid-1960s.

Sachs, one of a number of South African Jews who fought apartheid alongside the African National Congress, was teaching law at Columbia University when he saw the production, having recently recovered from an assassination attempt – his car was rigged with a bomb – that cost him his right arm and the sight in one eye.

"When I was writing the diaries in prison, I hoped that my story would be turned into a play one day," said Sachs, who visited Winnipeg on Jan. 26 as part of the Asper Foundation Lecture Series to discuss the Jewish role in the anti-apartheid struggle and give a progress report on the new South Africa.

"I envisaged the audience at one point left to stare at a wall for three minutes. That's what happened at that Toronto production. The silence was so powerful.

"Then I came on stage and embraced R.H. [Thompson, who played Sachs] and thanked all those Canadians who did much to help fight apartheid. It was a very intense moment."

Sachs, a South African-trained lawyer, is now a judge on South Africa's Constitutional Court.

He left South Africa for England in 1966 after being imprisoned twice without charge by the apartheid-era government. He taught law at at the University of Southampton for 10 years,

In 1977, he accepted an invitation to teach law in Mozambique, which borders on his homeland. In 1983, he became director of research in the Ministry of Justice in Mozambique. After the assassination attempt, he moved to the United States and Columbia.

While recovering from his wounds, he also wrote the autobiographical The Soft Vengeance of a Freedom Fighter. He returned to South Africa in 1990 in time to help draft the new post-apartheid constitutional rights laws.

He told his Winnipeg audience that shortly after his return, he was invited to view an exhibition in Cape Town, his birthplace, outlining South African Jewish history.

He was disappointed at how bland it was and dismayed that there was no mention of the role Jews played in fighting apartheid. He cited the examples of his father, Solly Sachs, a garment union organizer, and his mother, Rae, who was also an activist, as well as people such as union leader and ANC activist Joe Slovo, and Eddie Weinberg, the unofficial photographer of the struggle.

"It took us eight years, but we organized [another] exhibition," Sachs said.

In accounting for the large number of Jews who were prominent in the anti-apartheid struggle, Sachs noted that most of South African Jewry arrived at the beginning of the 20th century from Lithuania to escape persecution and oppression.

"I grew up in a community of intense activity and idealism. We longed to bring about change."

Yet, he said, so many more South African Jews went along with apartheid. Sachs explained that this was because Jews were white and accepted to some degree as part of the establishment, and they enjoyed the perks of white South African society.

Most of them didn't want to "rock the boat," he said.

"I found it painful and ugly that a community that has known so much suffering, stereotyping and abuse would buy into the same behaviour stereotyping and abusing others and not be aware of it at all."

Despite the problems South Africa faces today with crime and AIDS, Sachs is positive about the country's current situation. He noted that it is about to hold its third election since the end of apartheid, and although white people still enjoy a large economic advantage, there is comfortable integration among younger South Africans of all races.

"In today's South Africa, you can be who you are and contribute what you can to society," he said.

"All the diverse communities contribute without feeling they are taking from others. The paradox of my generation is that we fought with all our passion to create a boring society."

In thanking Sachs on behalf of the Asper Foundation and the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative, which organized the evening, Judge Guy Kroft said Sachs has "inspired us to press on" with the foundation's Canadian Museum for Human Rights project. (Construction is slated to start in the spring of 2005.)

"We hope we can live up to your ideals," Kroft told Sachs.

חברי שמחה שימח את לבבי בבדיחה הבאה:

הינה עוד אחת משמחת לב:

We must help our fellow Jews in Argentina

By DAVID WINTRE

My wife Maxine and I recently returned from Argentina where we were visiting friends in the musical group Klezmer Buenos Aires. As well, we wanted to tour the beautiful country and to better inform ourselves about the current social situation and how it is affecting Argentina's approximately 200,000 Jews, who live mainly in Buenos Aires.

Feature

What we found was a country under economic, political and social siege, and a Jewish population devastated economically by currency devaluation and depressed by two terrorist attacks in the last 12 years – the first killed 27 people at the Israeli Embassy in 1992 and the second killed 85 people at the AMIA Jewish community building in 1994.

To understand what has happened to Argentina and to its Jewish population (once the fifth largest in the world), a brief historical review is necessary. How could a country that has an immigration pattern like Canada's and a richness in natural resources similar to our own, find itself an economic and social basket case that owes the International Monetary Fund $142 billion (US) – and cannot pay – and has a population of 38 million people, 53 per cent of whom (18.5 million) live below the poverty line?

In Buenos Aires alone, six million people out of a total population of 12 million live below the poverty line, earning less than $70 (US) a month. Unemployment has reached the staggering level of 22 per cent.

Only 50 years ago, this wasn't the case. To the contrary, the 21st century belonged to Canada and Argentina. Both countries had immigration policies that brought over a burgeoning and increasingly well-educated middle class population, mainly from Europe. Their political and social structures facilitated this growth and their future looked secure.

Then, in 1951, Juan Peròn was re-elected. Together with his wife Eva Duarte ("Evita"), who had a large following, he borrowed freely from Nazi Germany and fascist Italy and created a heavy-handed populist movement that depended on labour unions and the unrepresented for its support. In the process, both dissent and a free press were stifled. But as the economy deteriorated and support for Peròn lessened, a succession of military coups and dictatorships followed, culminating in the "Dirty War" between 1976 and 1983, which claimed 30,000 victims. Bombings and kidnapping were almost daily occurrences.

Argentina never recovered.

President Carlos Menem (1989-1999) implemented a few temporary lifesaving reforms but finally, in December 2001, the economy succumbed to a combination of overwhelming debt obligation, "pesification" (currency devaluation) and widespread corruption at all levels.

For the Jewish population, the economic, social and physical devastation is equally bad. More than 60,000 Jews are currently living at or below the poverty line. If a family of three makes more, they do not qualify for health or food aid. There is no national health plan. The American Joint Distribution Committee provides 25,000 people with monthly food vouchers and estimates there are 40,000 beneficiaries of its social assistance programs in 2003 (a 1,000 per cent increase in three years).

Jewish education, which historically has been the glue that has held together the Argentine Jewish community, has come unstuck. At its height barely a decade ago, there were more than 60 day schools with 22,000 students, representing 65 per cent of the total youth population. Today, 12 schools have closed, causing hundreds of teachers to lose their jobs. As of October 2002, there were only 14,800 children in the day school system, representing a 30 per cent attrition rate over the last decade. If trends continue and without immediate emergency assistance, the Jewish world could find itself with only one out of three Argentine children receiving any form of Jewish education.

The Argentine Jewish response to these catastrophic events has been remarkable. Despite an extreme lack of resources, 43 Comprehensive Social Assistance Centres (CASS) have been developed throughout the country whose purpose is to distribute aid that sustains Jewish lives on a daily basis. For example, prescription medicines are distributed through CASS by the Tzedaka Foundation, which operates the "Farmacia," a central pharmacy that fills thousands of prescriptions monthly. Yet there is difficulty in finding affordable medications to treat, for example, Crohn's disease, a condition with a disproportionate incidence among Jews.

Other major Jewish organizations providing welfare, legal or job retraining services to Argentine Jews include the Ariel Job Centre and AMIA. Support for these and other local groups is provided among others by the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, the American Joint Distribution Committee and the Leadership Council of Conservative Judaism, which supports Conservative synagogues, schools, camps and young adult groups.

As my wife and I discovered, Argentina today is the most schizophrenic of environments. Buenos Aires is a stunningly beautiful beaux-arts city of 12 million with enormous stretches of green parkland filled with resplendent statues. Throughout the day and into the not-so-early morning hours, handsome young men and women sit in the city's hundreds of cafés drinking strong coffee and eating delicious pastries while talking animatedly. Streets and stores appear crowded and the value, quality and price of goods and services are unbeatable.

Just below the surface, however, the economic and social disaster is inescapable. Desperate for a better life, last year, 6,000 mainly middle class Jewish people moved to Israel, where things are also not exactly rosy. Approximately 60 to 70 families currently live in Winnipeg, and there are similar numbers in Toronto and more in Montreal. Within a period of five years, the Jewish middle class in Buenos Aires has been decimated and will not recover in the foreseeable future. An entire generation has seen their savings and lifestyle wiped out literally overnight, with no hope of recovery.

It is difficult at this time of continuing crises in Israel and our many Jewish social needs in Canada to think about our fellow Jews elsewhere who are also in crisis. But they are thinking of us and need our help desperately.

Montreal prof attends funeral of Israeli soldier

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

When Chaim and Edna Avraham buried their 20-year-old son, Benny, on Jan. 30 at the Kiryat Shaul military cemetery near the Tel Aviv suburb of Petach Tikvah, among those looking on with grief and a full heart was Gil Troy of Montreal.

Troy had rushed to Israel as soon as he had heard the news about Benny's return and was staying at the Avraham home in Petach Tikvah. A history professor at McGill University, he has been a close friend of the family since they met in Jerusalem in June 2001, during a Birthright Israel trip.

By that time, Avraham, now 55, had been on an eight-month crusade to free Benny, who had gone missing along with two other Israeli soldiers – Adi Avitan and Omar Suwad – after they were ambushed and kidnapped near the Lebanese border by Hezbollah terrorists.

Speaking to The CJN a few days after the remains of the three men were returned to Israel in exchange for the release of more than 400 prisoners, Troy, 42, recalled the emotional intensity of his first meeting with Avraham and Edna, when they pleaded for support from the Birthright group.

Over coffee, a friendship blossomed between Troy and the Avrahams. Edna was a nurse and Chaim worked in public relations for the Histadrut, Israel's federation of labour. Troy said Chaim used every ounce of his PR savvy while travelling around the world on his campaign to free his son.

"He was really determined to put the story front and centre," Troy said. "Chaim travelled more, he spoke more, than anyone I've ever seen."

The campaign was not only to lobby the Israeli government and rally Jewish communities to do what they could, but to put international pressure on Hezbollah to let Benny go.

The Troy family and the Avrahams have kept in regular touch since the Birthright trip. In July 2002, Troy met them in Washington, D.C., where the Avrahams were continuing their crusade, and Troy gave them with a copy of his book, Why I am a Zionist.

Eight months earlier, in November 2001, the Israeli government had declared the three men dead. But "as long as there is a thread of hope," he recalled Edna saying, "we feel he's alive."

Friendship blossomed over coffee

In October of the same year, the Avrahams travelled to Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, where they accepted a 10,000-name petition organized by Renana Goldhar that asked the Canadian government for humanitarian intervention into the case.

While in Montreal, the Avrahams stayed with Troy and his family. The Avrahams returned the favour two months later when Troy visited them.

In Israel, the campaign to free Benny seemed to capture the public imagination like no other. In Canada, thousands of dollars were raised by selling ribbons, pins and T-shirts with the slogan, "Moms Waiting at Home."

Troy said he played a minor role in the crusade, adding that he was certainly not deserving of the praise Chaim used to bestow on him.

"I talked about it as much as I could. I dedicated some of the proceeds from my book for the Petach Tikvah library on behalf of the three families. I had an article in the National Post. It was my way of saying that this was important, but I didn't do all that much."

Troy said even though the family probably knew that Benny was dead, they never gave up.

But they were forced to abandon their hopes on Jan. 24, when word got out about a prisoner swap, and that the three soldiers – whose remains were positively identified in Germany – would be coming home. The deal also included the return of kidnapped businessman Elchanan Tannenbaum. Some Israelis, including the family of kidnapped air force navigator Ron Arad, strongly objected to the exchange, warning it would legitimize Hezbollah and give the group reason to kidnap more Israelis.

Troy spoke to Chaim the next day, and the moment classes ended on Jan. 28, he got on a plane. He arrived in Israel just a few hours before the bodies arrived at a hangar adjacent to Ben-Gurion Airport for a military ceremony he attended as a guest of the Avraham family.

At the ceremony, Troy said, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon spoke of the "Jewish values" that made the swap, in his view, a more than fair exchange.

Some of the images that remain clear in Troy's mind include Benny's older sisters, Efrat and Dafna, looking solemnly on; and well-known Israeli media personalities commiserating emotionally with the Avrahams and the families of the other soldiers, then regaining their composure for interviews.

"I felt I was there representing all the people from Montreal who couldn't come," Troy said.

Benny's body made several stops before reaching the cemetery – at B'nai Brak, where the family first lived, to a street to be named after him, to their synagogue, to their new home in Petach Tikvah. Troy sat in a car a little back in the convoy. A passerby who was stopped by the traffic got out of his car and placed his kippah on his heart. The driver said you would not see this in any other country.

The erev Shabbat funeral, carried live on Israeli television, was a "mob scene," Troy said, and tears and memories flowed copiously. Labor party leader Shimon Peres spoke of the "cruel world in which you cannot know what happened to your son." Avraham repeated something Troy had said in the privacy of their home: that Benny served not only the State of Israel, but Am Yisrael.

There are now two Benny Avrahams buried only about 20 metres apart in Kiryat Shaul cemetery, Troy said: Chaim's brother, who died during the Yom Kippur War in 1973, and his son, who was named after his late uncle.

The Aron Kodesh at a synagogue in Petach Tikvah has been dedicated in the younger Benny's name, as is a town park. And a painting drawn by Troy's 3½-year-old son, Aviv, hangs in the Avraham home.

But for the Avraham family, Troy said, the most important memory is the son with "a beautiful smile and lovely eyes."

The confirmed death of Benny and an actual body to bury has brought the Avrahams an element of closure, Troy said, but not before they had to endure "3½ years of purgatory and very public exposure of a very private pain."

Critic wrong about Shalom-Salam

By EFFI FROHWEIN

I am a third-year student at York University, an Orthodox Jew and an executive member of Shalom-Salam@York, and I feel compelled to respond to the Jan. 29 opinion piece written by Michael Tweyman ("Peace club just another propaganda tool").

Guest Voice

Everything Tweyman wrote was completely and utterly wrong. CJN readers should be aware that Tweyman is not a member of our group, did not attend our first event and hasn't even contacted any members of our executive to inquire about Shalom-Salam@York. So I wonder how he can make statements such as "the club has nothing to do with peace, and everything to do with anti-Israel propaganda."

For those who haven't heard of our group, it was started by three students – one Jewish Canadian, one Japanese Canadian and one Pakistani-Canadian Muslim. The executive council, which I am part of, consists of four Jewish students representing the Israeli side, one neutral Japanese Canadian and four Muslim non-Palestinian students representing the Palestinian side. This runs contrary to Tweyman's claim that our group is dominated "by the militant, anti-Israel left, making those Jewish students who participate nothing more than useful fools for their propaganda purposes."

We haven't come together to solve the Middle East conflict, but rather to reduce tensions between the pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian students on campus. Recently, we held our first event, "Peace is Possible," which attracted a sold-out crowd of 350 people. Students, administrators and the general public attended this truly incredible event. All kinds of people showed up – white, black, Israeli, Palestinian, Muslim, Christian, Jewish – you name it, we had it. We have also been written up positively in almost every major Toronto newspaper and have been guests on CBC's Metro Morning.

Our members have one thing in common: they are all against violence and suicide bombers, and they are all in favour of peace. There is no yelling, screaming, name-calling or finger-pointing in this group. As well, nobody blames any side for what is going on in the Middle East or on campus. Again, this runs contrary to Tweyman's charge that "the club is an implicit admission by Jewish students that both sides have made mistakes in the ongoing conflict between Israelis and Palestinians and that Jews and Arabs are equally responsible for it."

While it is true that our doors are open to anybody and everybody, you cannot find a home in Shalom-Salam@York unless you truly believe that peace is possible. Again, unlike what Tweyman said in his piece, only the executive council can make decisions, which prevents general members from changing the group in any way. Furthermore, every motion considered by the executive council can only be passed when there is at least a 6 to 3 vote in favour. Tweyman also fails to mention that we have a very strict code of conduct and are governed by a constitution recognized by York University.

Shalom-Salam's membership has grown from its original nine executive members to more than 100 people in just over four months. We have even had requests to franchise Shalom-Salam to other universities. We have also had letters of support from almost all the groups at York, as well as many professors and even off-campus clubs and organizations. In addition, we are supported by all Jewish groups on campus, including Hillel and the Young Zionist Partnership.

There is absolutely no truth to anything Tweyman wrote in his article. I invite him, or anybody else, to attend our general meetings and events to see how we're changing the atmosphere at York University.

Deadline approaching for arts festival submissions

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto is gearing up for its annual arts festival, being held this year at the soon-to-be-opened Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

"Colouring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Student Creativity," now in its eighth year, will open Mar. 21 with a reception from 6 to 11 p.m. and will continue the next day and evening.

Daniel Abramson, Hillel's arts and culture co-ordinator, is looking forward to using the new downtown venue. Its "fairly open concept" allows several events or performances to be held simultaneously, and people can wander from one to another, he said.

Hillel's arts program provides "a really wonderful expression of what being Jewish is," Abramson said. It also enables Hillel to reach out "to a section of our student body that may not have been interested in doing Jewish stuff with Hillel. Our program is designed to build a community of artists and start a dialogue between students who are artistically inclined."

Other arts-related projects on campus include crafting of Shabbat items, such as candles and silk challah covers, and mezuzah-making.

Middle East-related conflict and Israel advocacy on campus have taken centre stage in recent years, but "that's not all that campus life is," said Abramson. However, he stressed, "Israel is important to us all the time."

Cholent, for the uninitiated, the ultimate Shabbat dish

By BRIAN BLUM
Special to The CJN

When I was growing up, my mother wouldn't let me in the kitchen. I suppose she thought she was doing me a favour. But years later, I still panic when I'm asked to prepare anything more sophisticated than macaroni and cheese.

There is one dish, however, that I've managed to perfect – so much so that, in our house, it's known as "Abba's Cholent."

Cholent, for the uninitiated, is the ultimate Shabbat meal: a thick meat-and-potatoes stew that simmers all night on a hot plate until the water has just about evaporated and all you're left with is a gooey, mushy, absolutely delicious concoction that sticks to your ribs as much as your plate. It's the perfect food for a wintry Saturday afternoon.

Cholent was actually dreamed up to address two critical issues in the religious household: what to eat on Shabbat since traditional Jews don't cook on the Sabbath, and how to prepare something really fast since there's never enough time on Friday before the sun goes down, especially when Shabbat can begin as early as 4:15 p.m. in mid-December and January.

My cholent recipe goes something like this:

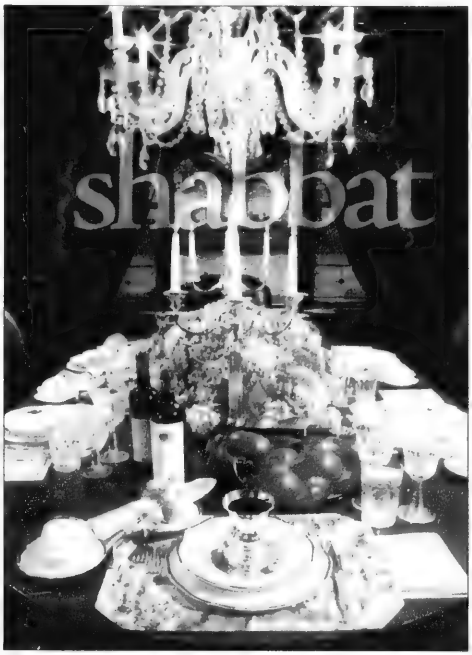
• Soak a bunch of red beans the night before ("a bunch of" is the correct measurement, I assure you).

• Throw the beans in the pot an hour before Shabbat along with some barley, onions, carrots, two kinds of cut-up but not peeled potatoes (sweet and white).

• Top it all off with several chunks of red meat (you can use chicken, but why not go all the way…)

• Then add in Abba's secret sauce – a hunk of honey, a sprizzle of ketchup and a glob of liquid garlic. Finish with salt, pepper, zatar and cumin.

• Cover the mixture with water and boil for an hour, then shift it to the hot plate until the next day.



"Abba's Cholent" made a late start this winter – it wasn't until recently that I finally deemed the lingering chill in the air worthy of the full cholent treatment. I had just finished adding the final spices and was heading downstairs to get five-year-old Aviv into the bath when an uneasy thought crossed my mind.

"Jody," I called to my wife across the house. "What colour is cumin supposed to be?"

"Yellow," she answered matter of factly.

"Is there such a thing as black cumin?" I asked.

"No," came the reply.

"Um… can you come look at this for a minute, honey?"

They were bugs. Tens of tiny black bugs had infested the cumin, which probably hadn't been used since last year's cholent.

"What are we going to do?" I demanded in a panic. This was definitely beyond my mac-and-cheese repertoire.

"We have to throw it out," Jody said. "You know bugs aren't kosher."

Not to mention really disgusting in a stew.

"But we can't," I sputtered.

We had a full table of guests coming over and the cholent was the major part of the meal. Not only that, but the kids were really looking forward to the first instalment of "Abba's Cholent" this year.

What was supposed to be a culinary triumph was fast turning into a gastronomic nightmare. This was even worse than the time Jody asked me to make a tomato soup, and I accidentally poured in chili powder instead of paprika.

Did I mention our guests that night were my in-laws-to-be?

"I can get the bugs out." I said defiantly. "It will take awhile, but I can do it."

I removed anything black: peppercorns, black markings on the potatoes. I consoled myself with faulty logic: according to Jewish law, as long as any bugs that remained were less than 1/60th of the total, the dish wouldn't be considered treif.

Of course, this rule is supposed to apply to "after the fact" discoveries, not upfront transgressions. And I'm not sure it even applies to bugs. Still…

I thought about a report I once heard on the National Geographic Channel, about how in places like Thailand they eat bugs.

"They're delicious, whether fried or sautéed, and so full of nutrition," the peppy announcer reported. "Just pop them in your mouth, exo-skeleton and all. It's like candy!"

Jody bathed Aviv. I continued to painstakingly pick out the bugs. The sun was going down and I finally got the cholent on the hot plate just as Shabbat began. We headed off to synagogue and didn't talk about it again. I would serve the cholent. We wouldn't mention to our guests what had happened. No one would ever be the wiser.

But then disaster struck again. We had been plugging the hot plate into a timer so it wouldn't waste electricity by being on for 24 hours straight. But cholent needs to cook all night, and I had neglected to switch the timer off. When I awoke and stumbled into the kitchen searching for my morning granola and rice milk, I immediately detected something was missing: no smell of bubbling meat and potatoes.

The cholent was cold, and the meat clearly spoiled by now.

Jody saw this as a sign. We dumped the contents of the pot in the garbage. The guests were spared. We doubled the salad and borrowed an extra challah from the neighbours.

That night, I had a dream. In it, our guests were eating my cholent. They loved it. And then one of them commented, "Mmm… crunchy!"

I looked down and, breathing a dreamy sigh of relief, noticed it was just an undercooked bean.

Arafat aide: PA may declare independent state in territories

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority is considering declaring an independent state in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and eastern Jerusalem if Israel moves ahead with plans to unilaterally disengage from the Palestinians, an aide to PA President Yasser Arafat said Monday.

The possibility was raised at a meeting of Palestinian leaders over the weekend, said Yasser Abed Rabbo, a former Palestinian cabinet member.

American officials have indicated that the United States expects Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip settlements to complement the implementation of the road map peace plan, and is not prepared to have Sharon's disengagement initiative replace the internationally brokered plan.

The officials also said the United States will not oppose the evacuation of Gaza settlements, a move announced last week by Sharon during an interview with Ha'aretz, but it will not allow Israel to expand West Bank settlements concurrently.

Abed Rabbo said many at the meeting of the PA leadership supported the idea of declaring an independent state, but he did not say whether Arafat was also in favour.

"This is one of the options that are being studied in response to Sharon's unilateral plan and to try to foil it," said Abed Rabbo, a member of the executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO).

> 'We are not discussing this as an academic exercise'

"We are not discussing this as an academic exercise," he said. "We are discussing this as a real possibility."

Israel said the announcement would do nothing to help negotiations on the road map. The Foreign Ministry said that rather than talking about declaring a state, the Palestinians should be cracking down on militant groups bent on attacking Israelis.

"What we are seeing is that every other day, there is another statement coming out of the Palestinian Authority," said Foreign Ministry spokesperson Jonathan Peled. "Declarations of this kind are definitely not productive and will not bring the two sides any closer to negotiations."

Last month, Sharon warned that a failure to revive peace talks would lead Israel to "disengage" from the Palestinians, which would involve redeploying Israel Defence Forces soldiers, dismantling some settlements and imposing a boundary on the Palestinians. In such an arrangement, the Palestinians would end up with far less territory than they seek for their state.

American officials have said the U.S. administration is not in favour of transferring Gaza settlers to the West Bank, a move favoured by the prime minister in return for evacuating the Gaza settlements.

Jerusalem sources hope the United States will agree to the expansion of settlement blocs due to be annexed to Israel under a final status deal with the Palestinians. Sharon is considering including the annexation of the blocs in his disengagement plan in return for a considerable pullout from Gaza.

Sources in Sharon's office said the Gaza evacuation will probably include the dismantling of fewer than the 17 settlements Sharon mentioned in his interview with Ha'aretz columnist Yoel Marcus last week.

Sharon's bureau chief, Dov Weisglass, and the head of the National Security Council, Giora Eiland, will travel to Washington for talks before Sharon's meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush. Under the planned timetable, the main points of the plan will be agreed upon before the meeting of the two leaders.

Sharon, meanwhile, began meeting with his Likud ministers to try to convince them to back his plan.

Weisglass is also due to meet Sunday with his Palestinian counterpart, Hassan Abu-Libdeh, and Palestinian minister Saeb Erekat for further preparatory talks before an expected meeting between Sharon and Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia.

Terrorists targeted Ottawa Jews: report

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The leaders of the Ottawa Jewish community were in the dark in 1999 about a possible terrorist threat against local Jewish targets by an alliance of Al Qaeda and Hezbollah terrorists.

A U.S. Library of Congress report, compiled in co-operation with U.S. intelligence agencies, stated that Al Qaeda and Hezbollah agents planned simultaneous attacks on Jewish targets in Ottawa, Buenos Aires and Ciudad del Este, Paraguay, the Globe and Mail reported earlier this week.

The agents operated in the tri-border area of Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay, in communities with sizeable expatriate Arab populations, the report stated. Through a series of arrests, police foiled the plot, which was aimed at undermining the Palestinian-Israeli peace talks.

Mitchell Bellman, executive-director of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa, said he does not recall being warned by law enforcement officials of a possible threat. "I'd like to know if we had ever been informed of this, and I'd like to know what the government is doing to protect Canadians," he said.

Bellman recalled that about two years ago, community leaders were apprised by Ottawa police of a potential threat of unknown origin. Community organizations and institutions were put on alert at the time and security was enhanced,. That threat had a specific time frame, but the time passed and so did the threat, Bellman said.

The Al Qaeda-Hezbollah threat predates the later incident by more than two years and dates back to before the intifadah. "This was a period when most Jews felt it was calm," Bellman said.

Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said he recalls "vague types of information" about a threat at that time. Few details were made available, but the threat was traced back to the same South American region, known as the "lawless triangle," he said.

"What [the Library of Congress report] does tell us is that it highlights the reality that Islamic terrorists see the Jewish community as one of its principal targets. Therefore, we as a community have to be very highly security conscious."

Prutschi noted that Jewish sites in Istanbul, Djerba and Casablanca have all been targeted recently by Islamic terrorists.

Prutschi said he had spoken to his contacts in the Canadian security community and was told the RCMP and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service "have a close watch on the tri-border area. The appropriate authorities most definitely have the Jewish community on the radar screen. They have been doing a good job in terms of staying on top of the situation."

The tri-border area of South America near the famed Iguazu Water Falls has long been suspected of being a haven for Arab terrorist organizations. The report states the area was used as a staging ground for Hezbollah, which is believed responsible for two devastating attacks on Jewish targets in Buenos Aires. In 1992, the Israeli Embassy was bombed, and two years later, the Jewish community centre was attacked. The attacks killed 115 people and left hundreds wounded.

'Time of malaise' for French Jews

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — French Jewish leader Roger Cukierman has moderated his tone during the past 12 months – but his message appears largely unaltered.

Jews in France are living "in a time of malaise," Cukierman, president of the CRIF umbrella organization of French Jews, told more than 800 guests, including 17 government ministers, at the group's annual dinner Jan. 31.

The content of Cukierman's speech, given in the presence of Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin and dozens of leaders from across France's political spectrum, has become the norm at such events in recent years – a catalog of violence against Jewish individuals and institutions.

"A simple meeting on the street, travelling on public transport or just a glance" often can lead to insults and physical violence for French Jews, Cukierman said.

His use of the term "malaise" is what has characterized the state of the largest Jewish community in Europe. Even if reported acts of anti-Semitism dropped in 2003, feelings of uncertainty are clearly going to take a long time to fade.

Nearly 5,000 French Jews have immigrated to Israel over the past two years, and immigration to other countries – particularly to French-speaking parts of Canada – also continues to rise.

For Michael Abergel, interviewed outside a kosher butcher on Boulevard Voltaire in the heavily Jewish 11th district of Paris, the issue is whether the government will be able to "deal with the integration of French Muslims."

"There is anarchy in the suburbs – and that's a problem for France, not just for Jews," he said.

The geographical nature of the problem was exemplified by a discussion between Philippe Schemba, who lives in the 11th district, and his friend Serge Seknega, from the Paris suburb of Le Blanc Mesnil.

While Schemba talked in broader political terms about anti-Semitism and how Muslim immigrants have imported the Mideast conflict to France, Seknega discussed his daily experiences.

"I feel the incivility, the gestures as I walk down the street," Seknega said of the North African youth he encounters.

Both men noted the government is beginning to tackle the problem.

Schemba said Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy has introduced new get-tough policies that have resulted in heavy sentences in recent weeks for anti-Semitic offenders.

In November, the government also set up a cabinet committee to tackle anti-Semitism. That decision followed an arson attack at a Jewish school near Paris that was swiftly condemned by Sarkozy and French President Jacques Chirac.

Reaction to the arson typified a sense of panic that has seen France blasted by Israel and international Jewish groups for what they claim has been a reticence to tackle anti-Semitism.

Yet many French Jewish groups say the government has turned the corner. Addressing the CRIF dinner, Cukierman praised Raffarin "for the battle you have led against anti-Semitism."

But while the government is pushing for tougher laws to fight anti-Semitism, the battle will be hard, Cukierman said.

"The old anti-Semitism of the far right has not disappeared," but it is no longer alone – Jews and Israel are now also singled out by the far left and anti-globalization activists, he said.

The government and major Jewish groups see a sharp drop in anti-Semitic incidents in 2003 – down from 195 anti-Semitic acts and 737 threats in 2002 to 125 acts and 463 threats last year. But both sides agree more needs to be done.

Indeed, on the night of the CRIF dinner, violently anti-Semitic slogans were shouted at French Israeli singer Shirel during a major charity event in central France attended by Bernadette Chirac, the wife of the French president.

Al Qaeda has tactical nuclear explosives: report

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

TEL AVIV — Al Qaeda has obtained tactical nuclear explosive devices that can fit inside a suitcase, Israel Radio reported Sunday night, citing the Al-Hayat newspaper.

According to the Arabic daily based in London, the devices are not intended for use, except in the event the existence of the organization is threatened.

The report said members of Osama bin Laden's group purchased the devices from Ukrainian scientists who sell them to anyone willing to pay the price.

Waqf's digging challenged

An Israeli archaeologist has charged that Muslim authorities are excavating a disputed holy site in Jerusalem in a way that endangers the remains of the Second Temple. Israeli photographer Yossi Milshtin recently took pictures that show stone blocks with a unique design linked to the Second Temple. Hebrew University archaeologist Eilat Mazar charged that the presence of the blocks in the middle of a Muslim construction project shows the Waqf, the Islamic Trust, is ignoring the site's importance in Jewish history. Mazar, a member of the Committee for the Preservation of Antiquities on the Temple Mount, said the stones were revealed by excavation work the Waqf is carrying out to build a new mosque in the Temple Mount compound.

Holiday dates changed

The Government of Israel has decided to postpone the the marking of Yom Hazikaron (for fallen soldiers) and Yom Ha'atzmaut in 2004 by one day. Yom Hazikaron will begin Sunday, April 25, in the evening, and Yom Ha'atzmaut will begin Monday, April 26, in the evening.

Saddam planned to strike Israel

A threat to launch chemical weapons at Israel was a factor that helped make the case for the Iraq war, the director of the CIA said. In a lengthy defence of the now-faulted intelligence that led up to last year's U.S. attack on Iraq, George Tenet said at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., that a person close to Saddam Hussein said "weapons of last resort were mobile launchers armed with chemical weapons, which would be fired at enemy forces and Israel." He described the source as someone "who had direct access to Saddam and his inner circle."

Ilan Ramon Hill on Mars

Egyptian judge stays

The International Court of Justice has refused an Israeli request to remove one of the judges who will hear the West Bank security fence case. The court refused Israel's argument that comments made in the past by Nabil Elaraby of Egypt betrayed his bias on the issue. Fifteen judges will hear the case Feb. 23 at The Hague.

Gaza plan referendum

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said a referendum on his plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip would be "a good idea." Polls show public support for the plan at around 60 per cent.

Mending fences?

In an attempt to satisfy Washington, Israel is adjusting the route of the West Bank security fence to exclude most settlement blocs. On Sunday, Ha'aretz reported that the new route would shorten the fence by some 63 miles. According to political sources, Israel hopes to get the Bush administration's backing for the new route to bolster its case before hearings on the fence at the International Court of Justice in The Hague on Feb. 23. A Defence Ministry spokesperson said construction of the fence was going ahead as planned pending adoption of the new route, which requires government ratification.

Zaka: bring Eli Cohen home

Israel is seeking to bring the remains of spy Eli Cohen home from Syria. The Disaster Victims Identification organization, ZAKA, is spearheading a drive to petition Syrian President Bahar Assad to allow a Jewish burial for Cohen in Israel.

Jewish students plan Hague action

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — The largest international Jewish student organization has announced it will send protesters when the International Court of Justice considers the legality of Israel's West Bank security fence later this month.

The Jerusalem-based World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS), which represents thousands of Jewish students worldwide, is co-ordinating a "silent protest march" on Feb. 23, the day of the fence hearings at The Hague, "to speak about our views," WUJS president Peleg Reshef told JTA last week.

The Brussels-based European Union of Jewish Students (EUJS) has also begun calling member organizations to galvanize support for the protest. In Berlin and London, Jewish student groups are calling on members to fill buses for the event.

"The point we are trying to make is if you bring the fence to the International Court in The Hague, we think you should speak about and bring to justice and trial the situation of terror and the horrific reality that Jewish people are experiencing in Israel," Reshef said, adding he has been in touch with Jewish student groups in Europe to help co-ordinate the action. "We feel that Jewish students today have a lot to say and a lot to contribute to these events."

> 'We try to mobilize Jewish students – not necessarily to demonstrate, but to make sure a more balanced view is put across'

At the headquarters of the EUJS, project director Adam Mouchtar, 27, has been busy for two days, calling Jewish student groups in Belgium and Germany to co-ordinate buses to The Hague. There are some 175,000 Jewish students in Europe, he estimated.

Uriel Kashi, 28, director of EUJS' German branch, said at least six buses would go to the protest from Germany.

"If you talk about the wall, you have to talk about the terror as well," he said.

Yet he said he was "of two minds" about Israel's recent decision to make images of a recent suicide bombing available on the Internet.

"If you ask me, it is a moral decline" to show dead victims, he said. "After Sept. 11, there was a decision not to show any bodies. It is against western ethics."

But, he said, if the Palestinians use victims for propaganda purposes, Israel should do the same.

Mark Ross, chairperson of the Union of Jewish Students of the United Kingdom and Ireland, said he hopes some 100 members of the group will head for The Hague.

"It's not easy for us," he said, pointing out that the date coincides with exams and final course work.

"I think it's very important to point out that the protest is not in defence of a particular Israeli policy, but in support of Israel and making sure that both sides of the story are heard," Ross said in a telephone interview from London, adding that Jewish students have had to respond increasingly to anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism on British campuses.

Ross had just come from a meeting about how to respond to three upcoming events on British campuses: an anti-Israel demonstration, a motion against Israel and a lecture by a speaker linked to Hamas.

"Each requires a different kind of response," Ross said. "We try to mobilize Jewish students – not necessarily to demonstrate, but to make sure a more balanced view is put across."

The student group is one of many Jewish organizations planning supportive action in The Hague. Others include B'nai B'rith International; the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations; ZAKA, Israel's Disaster Victims Identification organization; and Amcha: The Coalition for Jewish Concerns.

Echoing the concerns of other Jewish leaders, Reshef, 30, who attended the UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in 2001, expressed worries that the Hague hearings would become a similar display of anti-Semitism.

"At the end of the day, all the media focus" at Durban "was against Israel or against Jews. We have the feeling that in The Hague it is going to be used for these purposes as well," Reshef said. "People should understand that we live under the reality of terror, and it is not being discussed that the fence – which is supposed to be against terror – is on trial."

Knesset caucus offers new voice to Christians

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — For many Israelis, questions about the Christian minorities living around them often prompt hesitant responses loaded with suspicion and fear.

No one is sure whether they are "good for the Jews." What is clear is that the churches, monasteries and theological centres tucked away in the crannies of the Holy Land will now be represented in the Israeli government.

On Jan. 5, the Israeli Knesset launched the Christian Allies' Caucus – co-chaired by MKs Yair Peretz of the haredi Shas party and Uri Stern of the right-wing National Union party. Six other members from a total of six political parties, including the centre-left Labour and secular Shinui parties, will also participate.

The purpose of the committee is to facilitate communication and activities between the Knesset and Israel's Christian allies. News of its creation was announced live from Jerusalem on Janet Parshall's America, a syndicated conservative radio talk show broadcast across the United States.

For centuries, Jewish-Christian relations have been tense. Historically, European Christian neighbourhoods were not always the most welcoming for Jews, and memories of European anti-Semitism have often been explained as evidence that the Christian Bible presents the Israelites as cursed for not having accepted Jesus as the messiah.

Distrust of Christianity, reinforced through the ages by the Spanish Inquisition and Czarist pogroms, was confirmed in the eyes of the Jewish world when many churches turned their backs on the Jews during the Holocaust. Friction between the two communities has been further aggravated in recent years by the growing strength of the haredim in Israel, who are especially wary of proselytizing elements in the Christian world.

Yet, political changes in the Middle East have caused a shift in relations. Israelis have become increasingly aware that Christian evangelical support for Israel can't be ignored, and Christians have taken note that the Jewish state is one of the few places in the Middle East that still protects Christian rights.

On the Parshall show, MK Stern said that Israel has seen its support in America move from the political left to the right-wing Republican party, a change he attributes to a shared Judeo-Christian heritage.

The Christian Allies Caucus will attempt to further this growing relationship, Stern said.

Petra Heldt, director of the Ecumenical Theological Research Fraternity in Israel, hopes the new caucus will go beyond international political objectives. She sees the committee as confirmation that Israel is taking its relationship with minorities inside the country seriously.

The Ecumenical Fraternity was founded in 1966 to draw together clergy and theologians living in Israel and "deepen the Christian relationship with Jews, Judaism and Israel," its website says.

When Teddy Kollek was mayor of Jerusalem, the city used to bring the different mosaics together by spending money to restore ancient churches and develop infrastructure in the Old City, Heldt said.

She recalls a time when religious leaders would all come together to celebrate holidays.

"All that has stopped," she said.

Tensions were further aggravated over the past few years because many Christians were denied visas by the former Ministry of Religious Affairs.

"Hopefully, the newly formed caucus will resolve these issues," Heldt said.

Heldt has lived in Jerusalem on and off since the mid-1970s. She grew up in postwar Berlin, where she studied theology. In Israel, Heldt said she discovered "the God of Israel, instead of the notion of the God of Israel."

In the summer of 1997, Heldt was injured in a suicide bombing in Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market that burned one-third of her body. She was in intensive care for five weeks and received years of trauma-related therapy. Despite the experience, she maintains her Israeli residency.

"Christians have been taken hostage by the fear that the Old City of Jerusalem may fall under the rule of the Palestinian Authority," Heldt said.

> 'The only place in the Middle East where the Christian population is growing is in Israel'

Fear of retribution is preventing Christians from speaking out against the Palestinian leadership, she said.

Heldt understands that church leaders' support for PA President Yasser Arafat and the Palestinians has upset many Israelis. Yet, she maintains that under the political surface, there are a lot of people who recognize the value of living under Israeli authority.

"The only place in the Middle East where the Christian population is growing is in Israel," Heldt said.

Daniel Rossing, director of the Jerusalem Centre for Jewish-Christian Relations, said that most of this growth has been outside Jerusalem, mainly in the Galilee.

"In 1948, there were 45,000 Christian Arabs living in Israel. Now there are 130,000."

Rossing, an Orthodox Israeli Jew, believes it's time for the Jewish world to put aside its fears about Christianity and learn to understand it.

"Memory is very long in this part of the world," he said.

Historically, Christians in Jerusalem have often felt caught between the Muslim and Jewish worlds. Muslims perceive them as being part of the larger Christian majority and therefore part of the West, Rossing said.

Jews perceive them as being part of the Arab world and are suspicious of their intentions.

Despite the views of Palestinian Christians, such as Palestinian legislator Hanan Ashrawi, Rossing believes that the "vast majority of the [Israeli] Christian population don't have a political agenda and want to be integrated into Israeli life."

"They are the least understood of all the communities," Rossing said.

What went wrong for Joe Lieberman?

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Four years ago, he was the toast of the Jewish world, the favourite son who became a symbol of opportunity for American Jews in the United States.

But when he went out on his own this time around, Democratic Senator Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut failed to catch on as a top-tier candidate for the U.S. presidency.

Lieberman formally stepped aside last week, after failing to win any of the nine primaries or caucuses since the presidential season began. He came in second in only one of seven contests last week, in Delaware.

It had been clear for a while. Even Lieberman's mother, Marcia, had acknowledged earlier that her son's campaign "didn't catch on."

Now the question will be asked for years to come: What went wrong?

Was his religion a factor — especially for Jews? Are his politics out of sync with Democratic voters? Was it his style?

When Lieberman announced his candidacy in January 2003, he had the best name recognition among the Democratic hopefuls from his national exposure as the vice-presidential nominee on the 2000 ticket with former vice-president Al Gore. But even as he was leading in the polls then, political analysts did not consider him in a top-tier candidate.

"Name recognition that he earned from the national race four years ago never persuaded me he was a credible contender for the nomination," said Stuart Rothenberg, an independent analyst.

There are many explanations for Lieberman's fall. Some say it was political. Lieberman is a moderate on social, economic and political issues, someone who supported the Iraq war and was campaigning among a Democratic electorate angered by the Bush administration's handling of Iraq and his domestic policies.

In his announcement, Lieberman said he still believed moderation was the best way to go. "I offered a mainstream voice and I still believe that that is the right choice and the winning choice for our party and our country."

U.S. Senator Joe Lieberman

While that positioning might have served him well against Bush in November, it missed the point of Democratic primaries – playing to the party's base. Others say his mistakes were strategic, saying Lieberman had a sense of entitlement because of the election controversies of 2000, and therefore did not lay the groundwork for his candidacy as his opponents did.

Then there is the Jewish question.

While no one expected Lieberman to receive the full support of American Jews, some Lieberman loyalists say they did not anticipate the extent to which his candidacy would be rejected by some in their community.

Rabbi Irving "Yitz" Greenberg, president of the Jewish Life Network Foundation, and his wife Blu, were circulating an op-ed to U.S. Jewish newspapers last week, arguing that Jews were acting as anti-Semites would, casting Lieberman aside because of his Jewishness.

A rise of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionist sentiment worldwide brought old fears to the surface, Rabbi Greenberg argued, and Jews looked for a safer choice. "The community made a huge mistake," he said. "A victory for a Jew in America would have been a tremendous refutation of anti-Semitism."

Some Jewish donors said they would have given to Lieberman based on his political stances, but did not want to support a Jew at this time. It was easier to support Lieberman as a vice-presidential nominee, some Jews say, because he was blazing the trail without being the centre of attention.

But as his own candidate, and with increased Mideast tension and an uptick in international anti-Semitism, hesitancy grew.

Marvin Lender, a member of Lieberman's campaign board who raised funds for him in the Jewish community, suggested that Lieberman aides had anticipated raising more money from the Jewish community. He blames the fear as one element, but says the community's political sophistication also hurt Lieberman's chances.

"Many leaders of the Jewish community, the politically invested people, had already made commitments," he said.

Indeed, many seasoned political donors in the Jewish community had ties to other candidates. It was easier to support Lieberman in 2000, when he was not running against other Democrats.

Not all Jewish analysts believe Lieberman was hurt by his community. He galvanized many Jews who may not have given in past political races to donate, they say, but did not get support from others because of his moderate politics.

"Jews were happy for Lieberman, happy he could run for president, but sadly, just didn't embrace his politics," said Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic media strategist.

"Lieberman was always out of sync with his party," Rothenberg said. "He was not as liberal on foreign policy and economic issues."

Others say that he was handicapped by his choice to wait to launch his campaign until Gore decided not to enter the race. Yet, Gen. Wesley Clark entered the race late, but fared better.

Lieberman did not stress his electability enough, some say. "Voters wanted somebody who could really stick it to Bush and is confrontational and aggressive," Rothenberg said.

That wasn't Lieberman.

Despite his poor showing, Lieberman's candidacy was historic. Only two other Jews have sought the presidency – Pennsylvania Republican Senator Arlen Specter in 1996 and the late Pennsylvania Governor Milton Shapp for the Democrats in 1976 — but neither got as far as Lieberman.

Israel shocked over 'unjust' U.K. report

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Israel rejected last week the conclusions of a British parliamentary committee's report on the humanitarian situation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, calling it biased and unjust.

"We are shocked by the failure of the committee to deal with the central issue – the campaign of terror and incitement initiated by [Palestinian Authority President] Yasser Arafat and the terror organizations," the Israeli Embassy in London said in a statement. "Israel is not prepared to accept the committee report, which we see as biased and unjust to the core."

Members of the British Parliament's Select Committee on International Development have called on the government of Prime Minister Tony Blair to consider "economic pressure on Israel to ease movement restrictions which are crippling the Palestinian economy and causing soaring poverty."

The panel, which published the report last Thursday, expressed "serious concern over a range of policies adopted by the Israeli government and the negative impact they are having on living conditions of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza."

In its statement, the Israeli Embassy said it was aware of the economic situation in the territories, but noted the Palestinian leadership appeared more focused on terrorism than "in improving the economic situation of its people?" the statement said.

The committee called for both the European Union and Britain "to take a stronger stance on these issues and to consider using economic pressure to persuade Israel to ease restrictions."

According to the report, "malnutrition rates in Gaza and parts of the West Bank equal those in sub-Saharan Africa and regional unemployment stands at a staggering 60 to 70 per cent."

The authors of the report stressed that, although they are "highly sympathetic to Israeli safety concerns, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that there is a deliberate Israeli approach of putting the lives of ordinary Palestinians under stress as part of a strategy to bring the population to heel. Certain security measures, including the construction of the security barrier and movement restrictions imposed on Palestinians, are completely undermining the viability of a future Palestinian state."

The findings are the result of a detailed six-month inquiry that involved collecting written and oral evidence and conducting a fact-finding visit to the region.

"Our report is a balanced assessment of the humanitarian situation in the occupied Palestinian territories," said panel chair MP Tony Baldry. "It shows that Israel's security policy is having a marked impact on everyday life. Key measures, such as the construction of a security barrier higher than the Berlin Wall, may bring the mirage of immediate security to Israelis, but the level of despair felt by ordinary Palestinians at being denied an ordinary life can only increase the supply of suicide bombers. Nor is it likely to elicit any concessions from the Palestinian leaders."

Israeli mentalist likes to play with people's minds

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

But this isn't sleight-of-hand, magician and mentalist Haim Goldenberg claims.

He asks me to pick a card from an ordinary deck of Bicycles. I look at it and slip it back. It's the eight of hearts.

Next, he tells me he's going to ask me some questions, but says that I shouldn't answer him.

"Is it black or red, black or red? I'll say red. Is it a heart or diamonds, heart or diamonds. I'll say hearts."

All the time he's looking at me closely, shuffling the cards from hand to hand.

"It's an eight or a nine. Lower than a nine. It's the eight of hearts."

I'm baffled. So what's the trick.

It's not magic in the usual sense, says Goldenberg, 28. "I don't use props, marked cards or special equipment. It's all in the ability to read a person's body language."

Hmmm. I'd hate to play poker with him.

Goldenberg, an Israeli currently staying with family in Toronto, says he was unsatisfied after practising "regular" magic for many years.

"I started magic when I was very young. When I was 21 or 22 I did a lot of magic shows, but was not satisfied," he says. "I did all the card tricks and bending a [specially prepared] spoon.

"In time, I began to do these tricks with no gimmicks. I learned that I could play with people's minds."

Soon, he says, he could start bending real spoons.

Although he didn't bend any spoons for me, he did levitate a pair of glasses and move a fork around the floor without touching it.

"It's not a power. It's a special ability that everyone can do," he says.

"But," he adds, "just as anyone can learn to play the piano, not everyone can play like Mozart."

In other words, he says, we all have the ability within us, though some are more talented than others.

There are no props or sleight-of-hand involved in mentalism. "We use mental ability and talent. Magic is a visual thing, mentalism is in the mind. I make what's in the mind visual. It's not magic – there's no trickery."

Goldenberg insists he only does what he does for entertainment purposes.

"Lots of people ask me to solve their problems, but I never get personal. Three per cent of the time I make mistakes. I wouldn't want someone to change their life over something I've said."

Mentalism, he says, is a "step up" from regular magic.

In performance, he's able to bend spoons, make pages from books disappear and appear in unexpected places, make people feel as though they'd been touched when they're alone on stage, and other such "supernatural" phenomena.

"Many people who come on stage are nervous, and it's easy to use mind control on them," he says.

Goldenberg is very excited about the advancement of technology in magic and mentalism. He has developed a number of tricks he performs using a computer.

For example, he shows six lit candles on a computer screen.

A member of the audience points to a candle and without punching any keys or clicking a mouse, Goldenberg blows at the screen and makes the chosen flame disappear.

Goldenberg has garnered a lot of notoriety in the business. He's been written up in Newsweek, Ha'aretz and the Jerusalem Post, and he has performed worldwide, including recent stints in Las Vegas and New York City.

And although he now eschews sleight-of-hand "regular" magic, he's not averse to selling it.

He's written a number of books and computer programs on magic that he sells, and he lectures to other magicians. He has also invented props and other gadgets, such as a series of marked cards, that he sells.

"I invent new ways of doing old card tricks," he says. "It's not what I like doing, though."

Not that he can't do it. Before leaving the interview, he does one more trick for me.

I pick a card. It's the nine of diamonds. I put it back in the deck at random. He selects a card and shows it to me. It's a six of clubs.

"Is this the card?"

No, I say.

Still showing it to me, he asks, "Is it anything like the one you chose?"

I pause for a moment. A six and a nine are similar, I suppose. "Sort of," I say.

"Sort of," he says. He puts the card face down on the table, the rest of the pack still in his hand.

"What was that card?" he asks.

"A six of clubs."

And the card you chose?

"The nine of diamonds."

He motions me to flip over the card that he put on the table – the one I swear was the six of clubs a moment ago.

I flip it over. Of course, it's the nine of diamonds.

Goldenberg plans on settling in Toronto with his wife. Right now, he's mainly doing corporate and private shows, although he plans to get his paperwork in order to do larger shows in Canada.

Mother Tongue speaks about female heroes

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Growing up, Susan Poizner attended United Synagogue Day School in Forest Hill, and soon became frustrated that only white Jewish culture surrounded her. Wanderlust gripped her and she left Canada at 18 to live in Israel for six years.

"I needed to experience different people," she says in an interview at Yonge Street's Mars Restaurant. Living with Yemenite and Dutch flatmates instilled in Poizner a passion for myriad cultures.

That desire is now part of her "dream job," she says – producing a 13-part series on Canadian history told from a female perspective. Poizner also directs, writes and hosts Mother Tongue: The Other Side of History, which first aired Feb. 1 on TVOntario, but is slated for broadcast two more times later this month.

Mother Tongue's premiere – appropriately dotting Black History Month – tells the story of a fugitive slave who fled to Buxton, Ont., near Chatham-Kent. The half-hour documentary chronicles Eliza Parker's quest to abolish slavery, and describes how the freedom fighter influenced her descendant, 16-year-old Toni Parker.

Poizner sums up Toni's sentiments, which apply to any race or religion: "In the end, knowing your history makes you a stronger person."

In a month, Poizner, 37, plans to visit Winnipeg's Jewish community for an upcoming episode, due to air in early 2005 (as will the other 12 parts). An ancestor of Roz Usiskin sought to organize a national union while working as a dressmaker, and Poizner believes the story is compelling.

"There's the perception that women just did the dishes and washed the floor," she explains. "But they did more than people think – they kept the culture and the family unit intact."

Fleshing out the nation's untold tales is also the show's raison d'être, she says.

"In school, textbooks told me Canada was very multicultural, but it was never brought to life. I hope that Mother Tongue encourages people to meet their neighbours and break down barriers."

Poizner has led by example, studying international relations and Russian at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. She began to write for the Jerusalem Post and later moved to London, England, where she freelanced for the Guardian and the Times. She filed reports for Associated Press Television News and London Radio News, often travelling to Austria, Turkey and Moscow to find stories.

"When someone referred to me as Canadian, I said, 'No, I'm Jewish.' I then realized that a range of ethnic communities thrive in Canada, and that I had to explore my own country like I explored Europe."

When she returned to Toronto and started to research under-reported, culturally rich areas, Poizner discovered that "within Canada, you can feel like you've gone abroad."

Each episode of Mother Tongue aims to educate viewers on a specific female hero within a community by retelling the story through archival footage or text, and by visiting local heritage sights. Besides profiling a Jewish labour unionist, Poizner plans to cover an Acadian mail-order bride in Caraquet, N.B., and an Icelandic suffragette in Gimli, Man.

"This is my dream job because I'm giving people a voice that deserves to be heard," she says, relating the example of Russian Doukhobors in British Columbia who were labelled an extremist group in the 1930s for protesting naked. One misleading chapter in the Doukhobors' history need not taint the whole book, she believes.

"There is so much beauty and spirituality in that culture that I felt enriched by learning about it," Poizner says.

Within Mother Tongue's look at different cultures, Poizner focuses on stories of female strength and perseverance. As she relates in the series' opening sequence, history has always told "his story" and the series seeks to tell "her story."

The content of the remaining episodes is still unconfirmed, and Poizner is looking for interesting family tales that would best suit Mother Tongue's mandate. She can be reached at info@mothertongue.ca.

A repeat of Mother Tongue's premiere will air on the digital channel Book TV on Feb. 17 at 9 p.m. and Feb. 22 at 6 p.m.

Former Torontonian makes it as a Hollywood film editor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A film editor is usually one of the unsung heroes of a movie – the person most filmgoers rarely remember, even if they've bothered to read the credits.

Anyone with even the slightest knowledge of cinema realizes that editors play a central role in the making of a film. Just ask Andrew Eisen, a 39-year-old former Torontonian who co-edited The Statement, directed by Norman Jewison, produced by Robert Lantos and starring Michael Caine.

"The editor's job is an important one," said Eisen, an Associated Hebrew Schools graduate who has been gainfully employed in Hollywood for the past 16 years.

But Eisen, who has also worked with such high-powered directors as Wolfgang Petersen and Philip Noyce, does not take himself too seriously.

As he is fond of saying, film is a collaborative art form. "The director, producer and studio are all weighing in on the cut of a film, and so an editor can never take full credit."

Yet, as Eisen acknowledged in an interview, an editor is indispensible, shaping ungainly raw footage into a scene, a sequence and, finally, a film.

"You must have a good balance of storytelling ability, a sense of rhythm, technical ability to work the equipment and enough political savvy to deal with the various egos and personalities involved," he explained.

"The editor is there to maintain a certain objectivity, to keep the film on an even keel and the pace flowing and to enhance interest in the characters and the story."

In The Statement, which is about a French war criminal-cum fugitive with Jewish blood on his hands, Eisen was called upon to exercise all these talents.

"The first cut I showed to Jewison, two weeks after we wrapped shooting, was two hours and 40 minutes," he said. "Three months later, we got it down to its current length of just under two hours. I may not have gone to medical school, but there was some pretty fancy surgery paring all that footage while not losing story and character."

The Statement, which received mixed reviews, was the latest in a long line of films that Eisen has worked on.

His first film, Sadie and Son (1987), starring Debbie Reynolds, gave him a taste of the craft. "I was responsible for syncing the dailies, which means putting the picture and the sound together so the filmmakers could view what they had shot the previous day."

Since then, Eisen had edited more than 25 films, many made expressly for television. His credits run the gamut from Clear and Present Danger and Bogus to The Bone Collector and Extreme Days.

The Statement, however, was a special film for Eisen. "It was a subject I could sink my teeth into." And it was clearly the highest-profile film he has worked on as a full editor in terms of budget, exposure and star power.

"I'm still working on putting together deleted scenes for the DVD release. As for the future, we'll have to wait and see what's around the corner."

Film editing, he said, is tough and fiercely competitive.

"What makes anyone in this business desirable is success. Everyone is always looking at your resumé to see what high-profile film you've worked on last and how much it earned at the box office."

At this point, he cannot be choosy. "Unless I'm getting multiple offers, I usually take what is offered," said Eisen, who lives in Studio City with his French wife Stephanie and their daughter Daphna (another child is on the way).

Andrew Eisen

And while he earns a respectable living, he cannot afford to be idle. "Because editors generally do not participate in the profits of a film, I'm not getting filthy rich doing what I do. The idea of Jewish school tuition for my kids still absolutely terrifies me."

Born in Toronto, he is the fourth of five children raised by Isadore and Batya Eisen. His younger brother, Ronnie, co-produced the acclaimed documentary, Spellbound. His oldest sibling, Beth, is a respiratory therapist. Joel and David, his other two brothers, are physicians.

Eisen was drawn to the film industry when he was only 11 or 12 years old. Rummaging through his attic, he stumbled upon his father's old Kodak Brownie 8mm camera. The discovery unlocked nostalgic memories of the 1960s, when his father would film family gatherings and he and his siblings would watch the film on a white sheet on the wall, munching popcorn that Batya whipped up on the stove.

"Sitting in the dark watching these films fascinated me, and the whole process of how they got on to the screen amazed me even more."

Inspired by his father's amateur footage, he and Ronnie began making films. "These were the seeds of my editing career," he recalled.

When he was a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Eisen cobbled together a film about past school trips. He remembers it well.

"Despite a few risqué moments that had some faculty embarrassed but snickering, the film was a resounding success among my classmates."

Eisen studied filmmaking at York University, but honed his skills at a Toronto film company specializing in commercials. It was there that he really learned about editing.

He left Toronto for Los Angeles in 1988.

"The films I had worked on at home were only shooting in Toronto. The editing was done in L.A., so I was only learning half of the process. I wanted to work on a film from start to finish, and L.A. was where it was happening.

"I also needed to spread my wings, leave the nest, and go for my dream of working in Hollywood. Naive, maybe, but it allowed for a fearlessness and feeling of invincibility that gave me, this quiet Jewish kid from Toronto, the chutzpah to try."

Once in Los Angeles, Eisen pounded the pavement and wrote wads of letters before being given a chance to break into the industry.

"Luckily for me, I didn't have to wait years to get a project going."

Asked if he likes California, Eisen answered with a resounding yes. From his home in the hills, he has easy access to bucolic hiking trails, where he can spot deer and exotic birds.

"I can drive 20 minutes west to the Pacific Ocean, or 20 minutes east and be in the desert. The weather is great almost all the time, and I manage to stay employed. What was that question again?"

TWO HOLOCAUST PLAYS GOING INTO PRODUCTION

Two very different Holocaust-related plays are going into production in Toronto for performance in March.

The first is Robert Majzels' two-act play, This Night, which won the 1994 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition. The Montreal-born writer is a Governor General's Award recipient and has also written several novels.

Vivian Kaplan

This Night explores the dilemma of children of the Holocaust, saddled with a memory that is not their own. The Teatron production is directed by Ari Weisberg and features David Rosser, Jack Kennedy and Howard Jerome. Berkeley Street Theatre. $32-$24. Previews March 2, runs March 3 to 20. 416-368-3110.

The Trials of John Demjanjuk, Toronto playwright Jonathan Garfinkel's "Holocaust cabaret," is also being readied for a March opening. Directed by Jen Herszman Capraru, the production stars Christine Brubaker, Dmitry Chepovetsky, Dov Mikelson and Clinton Walker. Harbourfront Centre, Studio Theatre, March 3 to 7 (previews March 2). $22-$12; Sunday matinee PWYC. 416-973-4000, www.harbourfront.on.ca.

Those who wish to examine yet another aspect of genocide and its repercussions may find The Rogues of Urfa of interest. Presented by Alianak Theatre, the Araxi Arslanian play, directed by Jennifer Brown, offers an examination of historic and personal events tied to the Armenian holocaust. Artword Alternative Theatre, 75 Portland St. $20-PWYC. Opens March 24. 416-504-PLAY (7429).

Casting Call: Encore Entertainment is seeking performers for A Fiddler, A Phantom and 3 Singing Cats, a lively cabaret-style revue about a group of actors trying to succeed in New York. It features Broadway music as well as monologues and short scenes.

Six strong singer-actors are required for principal roles, as well as a small chorus of singer-dancers for the non-Equity, non-paying production; males are especially sought. Audition dates are Feb. 18, 19 and 23; rehearsals start Feb. 29 and performances begin in May at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. 416-733-0558.

Escape to Shanghai: Vivian Kaplan speaks about her family's escape from Nazi-occupied Vienna to Shanghai, as described in her book, Ten Green Bottles, which won a Canadian Jewish Book Award last year in the Memoir category. Torontonian Ian Leventhal, who co-arranged an artistic memorial in the Ohel Moshe Synagogue in Shanghai, where Kaplan's parents were married, presents some slides. Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Ave. Free admission. Tuesday, Feb. 17, 8 p.m.

Paying tribute to an Israeli hero

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

"I know my flight is very symbolic for the people of Israel, especially the survivors, the Holocaust survivors. Because I was born in Israel, many people will see this as a dream that is come true. I'm kind of the proof for my parents and their generation that whatever we've been fighting for in the last century is becoming true."
Col. Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut.

By that point, space shuttle flights were becoming routine, and this one in particular had no special event tied to it. It was purely a science experiment flight – nothing especially exciting.

But in Israel, and for Jews worldwide, this flight had special significance. Among the seven-member crew was Ilan Ramon, an Israeli Air Force colonel and the first Israeli in space.

Two weeks later, on Feb. 1, everyone became aware of this NASA mission for all the wrong reasons when the Columbia exploded upon re-entry, killing all seven of its crew members.

Journey of Hope by Alan D. Abbey (Gefen Publishing House) is an Israeli-published book that tells Ramon's story, chronicling the selection, training, flight and death of Ramon.

At 52 pages, the book is slim, but it does the job remarkably well for its size. The author is vice-president of electronic publishing at the Jerusalem Post and has been a journalist for more than 25 years.

The book begins with the December, 1995 announcement by former U.S. president Bill Clinton during then-Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres' visit to Washington, D.C., that an Israeli would be trained to participate in a future joint space shuttle mission.

At the time, Abbey says, few took the statement very seriously.

"Most of the Israeli media pounced on the Clinton announcement as a joke. In Knesset corridors, members joked about whether it would be permissible for an Orthodox astronaut to operate spacecraft controls or take a space walk on the Sabbath. One Knesset member wondered what a Jewish astronaut would do if he found a dinosaur skeleton on a distant planet. Would the Bible have to be reinterpreted or even rewritten? Other Knesset members concocted jokes about a rabbi, a mullah and a priest in a spaceship."

But all this changed when Israelis realized that Ramon's flight actually was going to happen, and the media jumped on the bandwagon.

By April 29, 1997, Israelis knew that one of their fighter pilots would join the NASA crew, but they didn't know who he would be. At first, some in the government didn't want to send a military pilot. "If it were up to us, we would have put out a tender opening the possibility to travel into space to others – scientists, researchers, engineers," a government spokesperson said.

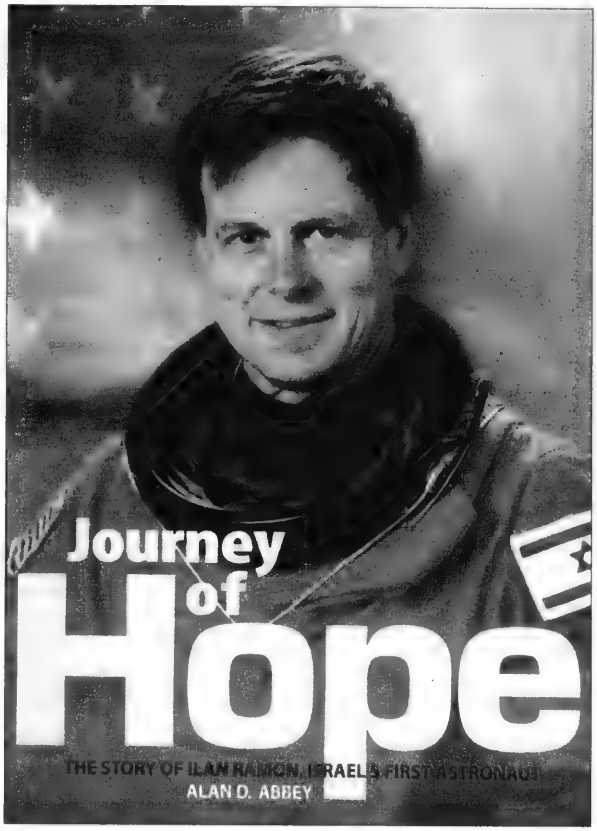
But since the IAF would be footing the bill for the astronaut's training, it wanted to send one of its own.

When NASA announced the names of the mission's crew in 1998, Ilan Ramon became a household name in Israel. Ramon, the son of a Holocaust survivor, was "unlike the caricature of the swaggering, macho pilot, he was modest and unassuming, even shy," Abbey writes.

It was later revealed that Ramon was among the IAF pilots that flew in the mission to destroy an Iraqi nuclear reactor near Baghdad in 1981.

When asked why Ramon was never promoted to general, IAF Maj-Gen Amos Yadlin replied that Ramon was too nice. "To reach this [rank], you need to be pushy."

Ramon took many items of significance on his trip. Among them were a miniature Torah scroll that survived Bergen Belsen, a copy of a drawing titled Moon Landscape, created by a 14-year-old Jewish boy in Theresienstadt, and a mezuzah ringed with bits of barbed wire.



And although he wasn't especially observant, Ramon demanded kosher food for his journey and planned to observe Shabbat as best as he could while in space.

The climax of this book is, of course, the climax of the story – Columbia's tragic re-entry.

In a moving chapter, Abbey describes the conversation at Houston mission control when technicians realized something horrible was taking place. He also describes vividly the reaction to the news in Israel.

"Israelis stopped in their tracks to watch the news. One group that had gathered to play tennis in Tel Aviv crowded around television monitors in disbelief. 'It was a celebration for the country and it is ending so tragically,' [one of them] said."

This book is a fitting commemoration to Ramon one year after the tragedy. Written by a seasoned journalist, it is straightforward, concise and to the point. It contains colour NASA photos, images of the Holocaust-related artifacts that Ramon carried with him and the Hebrew poem After My Death by Chaim Nachman Bialik that was read at Ramon's funeral.

Journey of Hope is available in most major bookstores, or it can be ordered at www.amazon.ca.

Tel Aviv University's Prof. Eldad Melamed has been appointed to the advisory board of The Michael J. Fox Foundation for Parkinson's Research, Canadian Friends of TAU announced recently.

Melamed, one of the world's leading researchers in the field, said, "It is a great honour and rare opportunity to study the disease in a comprehensive and in-depth way."

Michael J. Fox, star of the hit situation comedies Family Ties, Spin City, and the Back to the Future films, stunned audiences in 1998 when he revealed publicly that he had been living with the disease for the past seven years.

In May 2000, Fox established the foundation, dedicated to ensuring the development of a cure for Parkinson's disease within this decade through an aggressively funded research agenda.

Since his retirement from Spin City in January 2000, he has devoted himself primarily to his foundation's work. "In the last couple of years, I've gone from talking to my agent on a cellular phone, to discussing cellular biology with some of the world's leading scientists," Fox wrote in his autobiography Lucky Man. "It's a whole different world."

Melamed says that he is impressed by Fox's initiative. "This is a sincere, well-intentioned man who was stricken with the disease at a young age and at the height of his career. Instead of doing nothing, he is trying to harness his celebrity for the good of science."

The advisory committee of this $100-million research foundation will be occupied mainly in deciding on the direction of the foundation's research, examining the cause of the disease, and improving the ability to diagnose and treat it.

Parkinson's, the second most common neurodegenerative disease after Alzheimer's disease, is a motor system disorder in which dopamine-producing brain cells are compromised. This loss of dopamine causes nerve cells to fire out of control, leaving patients unable to control their movements in a normal manner.

It is estimated that the disease currently affects at least 500,000 Americans. There are 20 new cases of Parkinson's disease per 100,000 population per year.

While there are a number of contributing factors such as aging, genetics and environment, Melamed's team has zeroed in on oxygen.

Some degeneration is caused by what he called "oxidative stress" in the brain, which causes toxic substances to accumulate, thus accelerating degeneration.

Many have spoken of providing anti-oxidants to the brain to slow down the degeneration — but there are obstacles.

"There is what is called the blood-brain barrier. The brain does not let just any molecule in the blood go to the brain. There is a safety net that only lets certain molecules in," Melamed said.

Melamed is currently heading a team developing a new breakthrough drug, which combats neural degeneration, occurring both in Parkinson's and multiple sclerosis.

To date, in lab trials the molecule from which the drug is produced has proven safe and effective in slowing the progression of such neurological diseases.

At Tel Aviv University, Melamed is the incumbent of the Norma and Alan Aufzien chair for research in Parkinson's Disease and professor of neurology in the Sackler faculty of medicine. In addition, he holds the position of chief of neurology at the Rabin Medical Centre, a Sackler-Affiliated Hospital.

INTERGENERATIONAL PROGRAM: Grade 8 students at Leo Baeck Day School are engaged in a year-long program at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living. The seniors are teaching some students to knit, while other youngsters are helping Bernard Betel members in the computer lab. This intergenerational program provides an opportunity for Leo Baeck students to develop a relationship with people who have experiences to share and wonderful stories to tell, and to learn about volunteering. Pictured are Millie Goldberg and Leo Baeck student Leonid Kotov.

Racism a problem in Israeli soccer

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Chanting "Death to the Arabs," hundreds of young Jewish soccer fans race up a dusty side street to catch a bus carrying fans of the Arab team that had just beaten the home team in a tense game.

The supporters jeer even after the bus pulls away. Moments earlier, an Arab fan had been hit in the head with a rock.

Welcome to professional soccer in Israel, where racism and violence have become part of the country's most popular sport.

Prior to the game, the home team, Bnei Yehuda of Tel Aviv's working-class Hatikvah neighbourhood, was awarded a plaque for being Israel's most tolerant and sportsmanlike team by the New Israel Fund (NIF), which has been tracking soccer fan behaviour in a new racism index. The NIF works to promote equality, democracy and social justice in Israel.

Before this season, Bnei Yehuda fans had a reputation for being rowdy and racist.

The team had been leading Israel's top league, but for some Jewish fans, losing to an Arab team was the ultimate insult.

Immediately after the game, most fans were restrained, even applauding briefly for the rival team. NIF officials noted that the problems began, as they often do, outside the stadium.

Soccer hooliganism in Israel has not reached European levels, but it is very much part of the culture of the game – something civil society organizations and team officials are trying to change.

Beginning last season, the NIF racism index has been giving supporters of each team a weekly grade. Volunteers are planted as monitors in the crowds to record the number of racist songs, slogans and incidents they observe. The results, ranking the most and least tolerant teams, are published weekly and have caused a stir among soccer fans.

Overall, racial incidents are down at soccer matches this season, but ongoing Israeli-Palestinian violence exacerbates soccer violence, said Yair Galily, a sports sociologist at Israel's Wingate Institute.

Soccer "is a very interesting and authentic reflection of society. We have a violent society relative to other places in world, and we can see it in the soccer violence," Galily said. "Because it comes out in the context of soccer, it is legitimized, as if it's okay to get these things out as a catharsis."

Soccer hooliganism in Israel has not reached European levels, but it is very much part of the culture of the game

But the tolerance lacking in the stands can be found on the field, where Jews and Arabs often play on the same team.

"On the soccer field is one of the only jobs where you see Arabs and Jews working together," said NIF executive-director Eliezer Yaari.

Lior Asulin, a Jewish player, scored the winning goal for the Arab team, Bnei Sakhnin. He was cheered and hoisted on his teammates' shoulders as the fans roared.

Racism in Israeli soccer stems mostly from Jewish fans who feel they can shout slogans such as "Death to the Arabs" and "Go to Palestine" without fear of repercussion, experts say. The same cannot be said for their Arab counterparts. Jews playing on Arab teams say they feel at home on their teams.

In the late 1970s, the first Arab players were included on Jewish teams of the top league. This season, for the first time, two Arab teams, Bnei Sakhnin and Maccabi Ahi Nazareth, performed well enough to be included in the premier league.

In a sign of soccer's potential to become a beacon for coexistence, fans of the Nazareth team cheered when Israel's star player, Chaim Revivo, appeared on the field to play for the Jewish team of Ashdod. The Ashdod fans applauded the Nazareth fans in return.

Last year, a team from the Arab town of Kafr Kana was invited to play a match in Jordan but were told by the Jordanians that they would have to leave their Jewish players behind. The Kafr Kana management refused to go without the Jewish players.

According to the NIF racism index, Beitar Jerusalem fans ranked as the most racist.

At some Beitar Jerusalem games, song sheets have been passed out with lyrics put to the tune of a popular song. The song was directed at one of Israel's top Arab players, Salim Toameh, who plays for Hapoel Tel Aviv.

"This is the Land of Israel, Toameh. This is the Jewish state. I hate you Salim Toameh, I hate all the Arabs," the fans sang.

Racism on the soccer field is not limited to the Arab-Jewish arena. Black players – both Ethiopian Jews and foreign players from Africa – have been taunted with shouts of "Dirty black" and "Go back to the jungle."

"In the Hatikvah neighbourhood, we have only one thing to be proud of: Bnei Yehuda. It's not a personal thing between Jews and Arabs," said Ben Ezra, 17. But his friend, Lior Mizrani, also 17, said racial epithets are part of general tensions.

"We do say these things out of hatred," he said. "It comes from all the terror attacks and shootings and it ends up here, on the soccer field."

Canadians compete in Maccabi event in Chile

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Emotional opening ceremonies at the recent Pan Am Maccabi Games in Santiago, Chile, saw the daughter of slain Israeli fencer Andre Spitzer fly in from Israel to light the torch, honouring the memory of the 11 Israeli Olympians who were killed at the 1972 Summer Olympics in Munich.

It marked the start of the 10th Pan American Maccabi Games, in which more than 2,000 Jewish athletes from around the world gathered to participate in sporting competition. The event was originally scheduled for last July in Caracas, Venezuela, but political and economic instability there forced organizers late in 2002 to find an alternate host.

The next Pan Am Maccabi Games are slated for Caracas in four years time, assuming conditions in Venezuela improve.

The Canadian delegation to the Dec. 28-Jan. 4 event in Chile included close to 100 athletes. They vied for medals with participants from 19 countries, including such non-American nations as Australia, South Africa, Hungary, and of course, Israel.

"It was a first-class affair," said Allen Gerskup, head of the Canadian team and chair of Maccabi Canada's National Athletic Committee. "With what's going on in the world of Judaism today, it was very important to show our solidarity with the community down there."

Gerskup, a veteran of numerous Maccabi competitions, said he had never seen so many people attend the games before. A capacity crowd of 10,000 watched the opening ceremonies, forcing organizers to change the configuration of the stadium to accommodate everyone. Santiago's entire Jewish community numbers only 14,000, indicating the level of local support the event received.

The games were first held in 1964 and are sponsored by the Latin American Maccabi Confederation.

"This is important for the small Jewish communities in South America," said Gerskup. "It brings people out of the woodwork, tries to stop assimilation."

Canada won a pair of silver and a couple of bronze medals in basketball competition. Alex Brainis stood out on the open men's basketball team, scoring 43 points, albeit in a losing effort, against the United States. He connected on 11 three-point shots in that game.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

The mitzvah of tzedakah has both a private and public component. The public charity obligation is today operational only in the State of Israel (through taxation) and to some extent through the voluntary federation system. Understanding the potentially corrupting power of money, Jewish law rules that only those of unimpeachable integrity and reputation should be entrusted with distributing tzedakah funds. Jewish law even goes so far as to state that money should not be given unless this criterion is met, for only then can we be reasonably confident that public funds will be allocated "for the sake of heaven," based on need and not on connections, as Jewish law requires. Those allocating tzedakah funds must even vote against their own personal interests if the community as a whole will benefit by them doing so. Nevertheless, Judaism requires that an accounting be given of how funds are used, which in today's world translates into providing audited financial statements. One must thus do some homework if one is to perform the mitzvah of tzedakah properly.

While the proper allocation of charity funds is no easy task – the demand of the many worthy causes greatly exceeds the supply – certain guidelines do exist in our tradition. Jewish law stipulates that we should allocate 20 per cent of our net income for tzedakah purposes. Those who truly cannot afford it – such as a young married couple supported by their parents – would be forbidden from doing so. While, as a general rule, one may not exceed this amount, exceptions are made for the wealthy and money distributed from an estate. As the biblical tithes went both to the poor and to the Levites, the teachers of Torah, many have suggested that tzedakah should be divided equally as follows: 10 per cent in support of the poor and 10 per cent in support of Jewish education. Among the poor, one's first obligation is to relieve hunger, first and foremost amongst relatives. A women's needs are to be given precedence over those of men, and one may only support the needy of other cities (except those in Israel) once the needs of the local community are met. Finally Jewish law states that Jews must also give some support to "non-Jewish" causes.

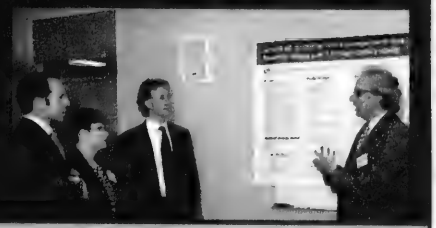
MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

THE BEST MEDICINE



YOUR SUPPORT MAKES IT POSSIBLE www.mtsinai.on.ca/foundation

Happy 10th Anniversary Leadership Sinai

Over the past 10 years, Leadership Sinai has made a dramatic difference in the lives of patients and staff at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Created in 1993 to attract and nurture future leaders and philanthropists, Leadership Sinai has raised over $3.5 million. This money has been used to fund important projects that facilitate research, enhance patient care facilities, upgrade technology and buy new equipment.

Leadership Sinai's most recent gift was for the Leadership Sinai Chair in Surgery and the Leadership Sinai Advanced Surgical Technology Centre.

The Surgeon-in-Chief is one of the top positions at the Hospital, playing a central role in Mount Sinai's vision of being a world-leading health care organization. The Leadership Sinai Chair in Surgery will enable Mount Sinai to remain an outstanding medical center by improving its ability to attract and retain the best and the brightest people available.

Innovative Communications Technology Advances Surgery

The creation of the Leadership Sinai Advanced Surgical Technology Centre (ASTC) has enabled Mount Sinai Hospital to broaden its scope and increase the effectiveness of minimally invasive surgery through the use of innovative communications technology and robotic surgical equipment. The new communications technology means surgeons at Mount Sinai Hospital are now able to participate in surgical education and consultation anywhere in the world, providing the other hospital has compatible equipment.

From the labour, delivery and recovery rooms, to the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, to the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, to the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes, to the Leadership Sinai Advanced Surgical Technology Centre, Leadership Sinai has left an indelible mark on Mount Sinai Hospital.

In addition to its financial contribution, Leadership Sinai has also been the training ground for a number of Mount Sinai's key volunteers. In fact, every one of its past Chairs has gone on to serve on the Hospital or Foundation boards: Miles Nadal, Geoffrey Bledin, Gary Fogler, and Michael Nisker have all continued their commitment to the Hospital. Certainly, Leadership Sinai's current Co-Chairs, Carrie Orfus Gelkopf and Jordan Bernamoff will follow in their footsteps.

How has Leadership Sinai accomplished all of this in only 10 years? One of Leadership Sinai's primary goals is to attract new members. Last year alone, 27 new members joined Leadership Sinai. The membership fee is $5,000 payable over five years. Members receive regular communications from the Hospital and are invited to a number of events throughout the year.

Fundraising to Make a Difference

While most Leadership Sinai events are designed to educate members about the Hospital and its world renowned Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute; Leadership Sinai also holds several major fundraisers including the Mount Sinai Classic Men's Golf Tournament sponsored by Equitable Trust. This year, to celebrate its 10th Anniversary, Leadership Sinai is planning a special evening to honour Dr. Don Low and his team in recognition of their extraordinary efforts during last year's SARS crisis.

Over the years, Leadership Sinai has provided a wide variety of support: funds to build a new centre, endowment funds for a Chair, funds to support research. The true value of Leadership Sinai's contribution is in the difference these funds have made in people's lives.

On this 10th anniversary, all of us in the Mount Sinai family say thank you to Leadership Sinai, as it continues to change lives and create The Best Medicine.

Do yourself a favour, take care of your body

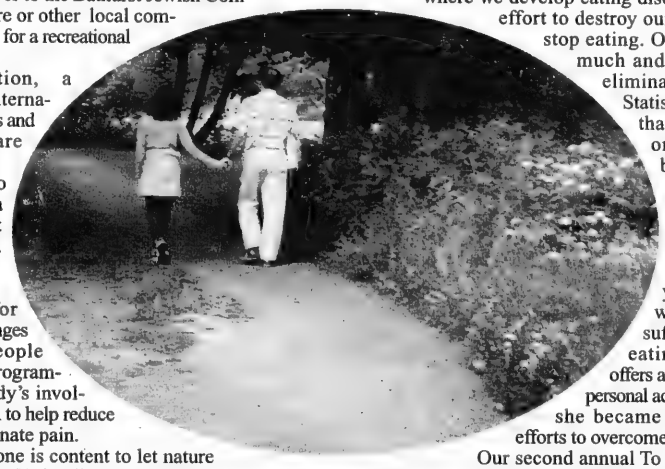
Editorial

As the population continues to age and the baby boom generation enters their senior years, many of us seem to be putting an increased emphasis on improving our bodies.

To some of us, that means watching what we eat. Studies abound proclaiming that certain foods are good for you while others should be avoided like the plague. Of course, in a few years, new studies may find these "healthy" foods should be shunned.

Then there is the tried and tested way, which is actually quite simple: switch off the television, get out and take part in some physical activity. It can be as easy as going for a walk, joining a fitness club or heading over to the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre or other local community centre for a recreational activity.

In addition, a number of alternative techniques and practices are available designed to improve a specific part of the body. The Feldenkrais method, for example, changes the way people move by reprogramming the body's involuntary system to help reduce or even eliminate pain.



Not everyone is content to let nature take its course. Today, liposuction and lipolysis offer alternative procedures that help shape certain areas of the body. In the latter process, instead of surgically removing fat cells, physicians infuse medications directly into fatty tissue. As the cells shrink, excess fat disappears.

Some people find travel the ultimate way to rejuvenate their bodies, especially during Canada's frigid winter season. They head to warmer climes in an effort to relax their aching muscles and prevent weather-related accidents. If you plan to visit one of the many exotic locations around the world and indulge in non-traditional tourist activities, make sure you are aware of the various tropical diseases that exist and take preventive measures. Dr. Mark Wise offers this kind of advice for the outward bound in The Travel Doctor, a guide for staying healthy while abroad.

And whenever you travel, Jason Rivers, a Vancouver dermatologist and former head of the Canadian Dermatology Association's National Sun Awareness and Skin Cancer Prevention program, urges you to watch the amount of time you spend in the sun, noting that sunscreen alone is not enough.

Sadly, some of us dislike our bodies to the point where we develop eating disorders. In an effort to destroy our bodies, we stop eating. Or we eat too much and then try to eliminate the food. Statistics indicate that eating disorders have become a scourge and experts find that most programs do not help. One young woman who suffers from an eating disorder offers a rare, moving personal account of why she became ill and her efforts to overcome her ailment.

Our second annual To Your Health supplement also looks at seniors, focusing on such topics as keeping track of what is often a lengthy medication list, how to find appropriate care and hearing loss, which affects one in 25 Canadians.

Suggestions as to how to improve our bodies are easy to find. Ask one person and you will come away with 10 ideas. Ask a group and you will have enough suggestions to last a lifetime.

Helping families navigate the health-care system

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Finding proper care for aging relatives or those with disabilities can be a daunting task. There are agencies, however, that can help.

In 1998, Ontario implemented 43 Community Care Access Centres (CCAC) (1-877-234-4343 or in North York 416-222-2241) across the province, in order to help clients arrange services in their own home, access long-term care facilities or obtain information and referrals to a variety of other services.

Stephen Handler, former executive director of the North York CCAC, which serves about 95,000 people, says the centres, which have a total budget of $1.2 billion, are fully funded by the government.

Clients can come to them directly, be referred by a physician or other health-care provider, or come as a result of having been in hospital.

Health-care services – CCACs work with about 20 organizations that bid for the contracts – include nursing, personal support, physio or occupational therapy, social work, nutrition counselling, palliative care, respite care or IV therapy.

Eligibility for services is based on medical need, Handler says. While one client may need daily care, another may need help only once a week.

If necessary, a CCAC can direct a client to other services if the client has needs beyond the scope of the CCAC, he says.

CCACs serve about 8,400 people a month, he says, and get about 1,000 new cases a month. "If the demand exceeds our budget, there will be a waiting list of people who are lower priority."

For people seeking a complete range of health-care products and services, staff at Qualicare (416-848-9574, andrea@qualicare.ca), owned by Wayne and Andrea Nathanson, can help.

For a fee, Qualicare can co-ordinate all of a client's health-care activities, or complement existing services in an institution or elder-care facility, says Wayne Nathanson.

"Our first priority is to ensure our clients are getting the community care they are entitled to, and then we supplement that care as required," he says.

When a serious illness strikes, he says, families face an overwhelming number of important decisions. "[They need] a strong, experienced team who has intimate knowledge of the health-care system to guide them towards the right decisions.

"[This team] is made up of medical professionals who can interpret a doctor's instructions, provide expert care, investigate medical options, cut through red tape and ultimately provide peace of mind," he says.

Providing homecare for relatives can also be challenging, he says. "People quickly realize that it is a complex job, requiring caregiver[s] to provide multiple tasks.

"There are many different issues that arise, and families [often] scramble to find out any information that will help them handle their responsibilities, often without any preparation or training."

Caregivers are frequently asked to perform jobs and understand ideas that health-care professionals spend years learning, he says. "It becomes overwhelming, stressful and very frightening at times. Ultimately, it is not uncommon for caregivers to experience undue physical, mental and emotional stress and eventually, burnout."

According to Statistics Canada, he says, of the estimated three million Canadians caring for someone at home, almost half say their duties have negatively affected their paid work, usually in the form of absenteeism.

"Eventually, the burden of the care can become so heavy that the primary caregivers must leave their job in order to deal with the juggling of regular family life responsibilities and the management of care issues," says Nathanson.

Qualicare recognizes the difficult circumstances, he says, and assists people in sorting through complex issues.

"Staff helps establish short- and long-term goals of care, provides case management and advocacy work on behalf of a family with a relative experiencing a long-term illness, and provides and/or co-ordinates a specialized solution," he says.

"It is important that families recognize the limitations and challenges they will have when trying to co-ordinate the care for their ill loved one.

"By soliciting professional assistance, the potential of receiving the best possible care is much higher."

Statistics tell horrific story of eating disorders

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

There is a certain terrifying glamour about eating disorders. People tend to imagine a pale and fragile young woman lying gracefully on a bed, reading melancholy poetry.

The truth is very different.

Statistics tell the horrific story: a report in the July 1995 issue of the American Journal of Psychiatry indicates that the death rate is about 18 per cent in studies done on patients 20 years after they got the disease, and that it rises to 20 per cent in studies done 30 years after they got the disease. The study also notes that the annual death rate associated with anorexia is more than 12 times higher than the annual death rate from all other causes combined for females between the ages of 15 and 24. (Only about 10 per cent of individuals with the disorder are men.)

'I want to eat and live like everyone else'

see page 17

In a study of 2,438 Ontario female students quoted in a Sept. 4, 2001 article in the Canadian Medical Association Journal, significant symptoms of eating disorders were reported by 27 per cent of girls ages 12 to 18.

Some individuals, having battled the disease for many years, and wanting only to end their torment, take their own lives.

Leora Pinhas, director of child psychiatry for the Hospital for Sick Children's eating disorder program, warns that "as parents, teachers and health professionals, we need to stop viewing disordered eating – in young people, especially – as a vanity issue and start viewing it as the life-threatening medical condition that it really is."

The most frequent disorders are anorexia, where the person severely restricts the amount she eats; and bulimia, in which a young woman will eat a large quantity of food, or what she perceives as a large quantity of food, and then attempt to purge herself through exercise, laxatives, vomiting or fasting. Often, these behaviours occur simultaneously.

Even if the patient does not die, serious damage can be done to her organs, her brain functioning, fertility, education, job prospects and relationships with others, warns psychiatrist Blake Woodside, director of the eating disorders in-patient unit of the University Health Network.

One of the worst aspects of eating disorders is the tremendous sense of hopelessness felt not only by the patient, but also by her family and friends. This is mainly because recovery seems hopeless, says Rosy Rosato, the mother of a young woman who has fought an eating disorder for about 10 years. Many women go through program after program, only to regress shortly after.

Not that there are so many programs in Toronto, anyway. The Hospital for Sick Children has one, but patients are discharged immediately when they turn 18, regardless of their condition. The University Health Network's eating disorders in-patient unit has one of the best-regarded programs on the continent, but has only 10 in-patient beds. There are programs at Markham Stouffville Hosptial, Homewood Health Centre in Guelph, and a few others in provinces across the country. Some nutritionists, psychiatrists and other health-care professionals offer private care.

Few studies exist to show how successful these programs are, but enough anecdotal evidence exists to show that the rate is not high.

Though awareness of eating disorders is growing, there remains little understanding of it among the public and even among health-care workers. It seems obvious to the general public, not to mention many health professionals, that all a patient has to do is to decide to eat and to stop being so silly and concerned about her figure. In other words, to just get over it.

The cause of these conditions is not known. The National Eating Disorders Information Centre in Toronto (NEDIC) says some factors thought to play a role are a lack of seratonin in the brain, depression, lack of self-esteem and the media's emphasis on thinness as an essential goal of life.

Telehealth means care's just a phone call away

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A family, fearing their mother is developing Alzheimer's disease, arranges for a consultation with a specialist in dementia. There is nothing particularly noteworthy about that, until you realize that the family is in Sioux Lookout, a town in northwestern Ontario some 65 kilometres north of the Trans-Canada Highway, and the specialist is at Toronto's Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The consultation is taking place via Telehealth, a program that brings together physicians, researchers, patients and other personnel via videoconferencing. The technology works locally, provincially, nationally and internationally.

"It is a huge opportunity for all aspects of health care, not just medicine, but professional education and administration as well," said an enthusiastic Tim Patterson, Telehealth co-ordinator at Baycrest.

Places like Sioux Lookout are a long way from an academic centre, and residents don't have the easy access to new techniques and cutting edge research that facilities closer to the main population centres do. That is part of the reason isolated areas have a serious problem attracting personnel, said Patterson.

"If you want to develop the north," he said, "you need access to good health care."

Baycrest health-care experts share their expertise with distant communities via Telehealth. In the photo, the Baycrest team is working with the Northern Ontario community Sioux Lookout. Baycrest staff are, from left, Rochelle Caratao, the Al Hertz clinical nurse specialist in pain management; Dmytro Rewilak, psychologist; Tim Patterson, Telehealth co-ordinator; Dr. David Conn, director of psychiatry; and Diane Buchanan, clinical nurse specialist.

A benefit of Telehealth is that it can reach a surprisingly high percentage of a potential audience. The Sioux Lookout conference, for instance, was intended for one physician, but seven people took part – doctors, nurses and occupational therapists.

The project was initiated Jan. 1, 2000, by Dr. David Conn, the head of psychiatry at Baycrest. ("We felt it was a sign, that Y2K didn't affect it", Patterson joked). A multidisciplinary panel consisting of Conn, psychologist Dmytro Rewilak and a nurse, Diane Buchanan, prepared a video about dementia and sent it to Sioux Lookout. The videoconference followed.

"There is great excitement over the possibilities of this technology," Patterson said. He noted that since the conference can include various health professionals, as well as the patient himself and the family, the possibilities for helping everyone are immense.

"It allows Baycrest to use its expertise to fill a real need, especially as the population ages."

Baycrest is a centre of excellence in the care of the elderly, Patterson said, and this is one way for it to be recognized as a leader locally, provincially, nationally and in the international field.

Telehealth has also worked with CISEPO, The Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange program that works to improve relations between the peoples of the world through health care. Videoconferences have been held with Arab countries, Israel and even the Far East.

His role, Patterson said, is to make people aware of the opportunities, and how to use computer networks in the best way. "I make things happen," he said.

There are various networks involved – they may link hospitals, academic institutions and/or governmental agencies. Mostly, he said, a system called Orion is used by Baycrest.

Videoconferences have been held with centres in such places as Lethbridge, Alta., and Timmins, dealing with pain management, helping the elderly use computers and various research projects. It helps that participants can talk to each other and share graphs and other visual aids.

One conference between Baycrest and a facility in Thunder Bay was on stroke rehabilitation. The technology allowed the Baycrest staff to see the reality of what they would ordinarily see only on paper. They were also able to see the patient himself.

There is more precision, he said. For instance, a medical note might say that the patient can move his hand. Through the videoconference, the therapist or doctor can see just how far and how well he can move it.

Body language is also a part of the experience. People might say they are very comfortable caring for their mother with Alzheimer's disease, but the camera will show the clenched fist and frightened eyes that say just the opposite.

"You can treat a patient, teach the personnel and maintain good relationships with other staff, all at once – that's the magic of Telehealth," Patterson said provides health portfolio management, after her mother broke her hip "and all 14 members of our extended family were thrown for a loop.

"With our health-care system the way it is, you have to be organized, informed and prepared. There are time and distance issues, and often emotions take over. I often wondered what my parents would have done if I hadn't been there for them."

Especially if their parents live in a different city, children want a finger on the pulse of their parents' health care, Brickman says. "We create a personal health portfolio with a record of relevant health data and history, emergency numbers, and medical records such as blood type and allergies."

Brickman can also be a personal health representative, she says, by preparing clients for a health appointment, or accompanying them to the appointment.

"We can be the single point of contact between the doctor and the patient. We do not replace the family, but we help them navigate through the complexities of the system."

Medical Breakthrough in Fat Reduction!

Infusion Lipolysis™: The Non-Surgical Alternative to Liposuction

Spot-Reduce Problem Areas of Fat and Cellulite
Target the areas that bother you, in priority, one at a time.

New Medical Science Developed by a Cosmetic Surgeon
Infusion Lipolysis™ shrinks fat cells. We break down and burn stored fat by infusing lipolytic/thermogenic medications directly into fatty tissue.

Safe, Easy and Affordable
You require only one medical clinic procedure, followed by home applications of custom-compounded, transdermal creams. Our Spot-Slimming, Cellulite Defence and Workout Programs are personalized for your metabolism. Compared to liposuction, Infusion Lipolysis is gentler, less dramatic, less traumatic, a fraction of the cost!

Rapid, Visible, Measurable Improvement
Watch the measured thickness of your surface fat decrease. Feel your tissue firm up and contour. Increase muscle definition fast.

Maintain Your Results Indefinitely
Continue our daily, one minute, home/gym maintenance program to discourage future fat & cellulite accumulation in treated areas.

We'll Prove it to You in a Free Medical Consultation!
See how much your fatty tissue shrinks in a 30 minute transdermal test. The doctor measures your fat thickness with skin fold calipers, applies a test dose of a selected non-prescription Lipolean™ cream and then re-measures 30 minutes later. The measurements speak for themselves!

Sunscreen alone is not enough: dermatologist

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A suntan is still considered a sign of good health or status by some people, but to Jason Rivers – a Vancouver dermatologist and former head of the Canadian Dermatology Association's National Sun Awareness and Skin Cancer Prevention program – a suntan indicates that skin has been damaged.

"A tan is a response to injury to the skin," said the University of British Columbia professor of dermatology in a recent phone interview.

According to the Canadian Dermatology Association's website, when skin becomes tanned or burned from sun exposure, damage is done to cells and to DNA. Some cells die and others repair themselves by getting rid of the damaged DNA. Cells that cannot repair themselves eventually become defective. If they are not destroyed, they slowly grow and produce a tumour.

Skin cancer – which has doubled in incidence in the last 20 years – can kill you, said Rivers, a native of Ottawa who did part of his training in Australia, which has the highest rate of skin cancer in the world.

In North America, someone dies of skin cancer every hour, but according to a 1996 national survey, about 50 per cent of people make very little effort to protect themselves from the sun, said Rivers, who advises moderation, not total avoidance.

"Don't spend seven hours lying on the beach," he advises winter sun-seekers, adding that tanning booths, which use ultra-violet light, are also not good for the skin.

In Canada, the sun is most intense from April to October, Rivers said.

"That's the period of the year to use sunscreen, primarily. It's useful for the prevention of some types of skin cancer, but also to reduce damage caused by the sun."

Dr. Jason Rivers

Rivers sees a lot of premature aging caused by sun exposure among his cosmetic patients. "The skin goes sallow, and becomes wrinkled. There are broken blood vessels."

Awareness about the importance of sunscreen has increased over the years, but Rivers said it's important to note that sunscreen is a tool that "should be used in conjunction with other measures like [protective] clothing, looking for shade, and trying not to be outdoors between 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. in the summertime."

Another issue, he added, is that people apply only 1/4 to 1/2 as much sunscreen as they should. "A teaspoon, or 5 millilitres, will cover about 1/6 of your body – an arm and a half. Put it on before you go out of the house in the morning." Dermatologists recommend a broad spectrum sunscreen with a sun protection factor (SPF) of 30.

In the winter, skiers should remember that ultraviolet radiation (a cause of skin cancer) increases four per cent for every 1,000 feet, said Rivers.

Anyone with a spot or mole that changes colour, size or shape, or that is not healing, should consult a physician, Rivers said.

Doctor helps travellers avoid tropical diseases

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

From the framed portraits of gnarled and exotic faces photographed in remote corners of the world to the tribal masks that clutter the walls of his office, it's clear that Mark Wise's place of business is no ordinary medical clinic.

Like many of the patients he treats, Wise is an inveterate traveller. Far ahead of his time, he made a practice of visiting out-of-the-way destinations where "all-inclusive" meant you got to rub shoulders with the locals on un-air-conditioned buses in the back roads of the Andes. Given his footloose forays into mountain scapes and jungles, it's no surprise he's made the treatment and prevention of tropical diseases an important part of his medical practice.

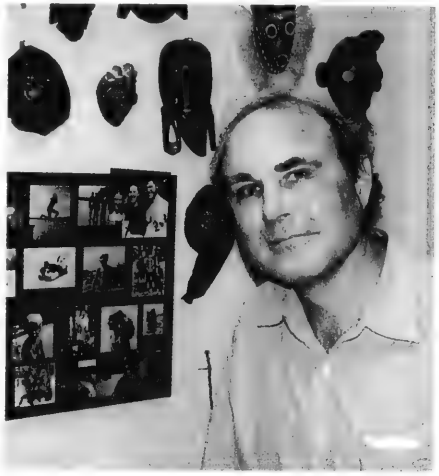
Nepal, Kenya, Guatemala, Tanzania, Ghana – they've all been on Wise's itinerary at one point or another during the last few years. Sometimes for pleasure, often for business, Wise travels to Third World countries where he's learned from first-hand experience there are nasty bugs out there that can jump up and bite you.

Whether it's Montezuma's revenge – a colourful shorthand for intestinal distress – or more deadly illnesses such as yellow fever, Hepatitis A or B, typhoid fever, cholera, tuberculosis and malaria, travellers should take precautions to ensure their trips remain fun, Wise said.

Because Canadians are venturing to more and more exotic locations around the world and indulging in un-traditional touristy activities such as jungle hikes, mountain treks, rafting or volunteering in impoverished villages, they are more likely than ever before to risk exposure to the kind of bugs that make them sick, he added.

Most exposure comes from ingesting tainted food or water, or from mosquito bites. In addition, immigrants from overseas may return from visits to their homelands, such as India or Somalia, with new infections. As a result, Canadian physicians are seeing cases of leprosy, where none were seen before, and tuberculosis.

"We like to think of travel medicine as not just us going there, but people coming back here," he said.



Dr. Mark Wise

Travel to South America is particularly popular these days, perhaps because it's perceived as safer than other countries. But he cautions travellers to exercise care over the food and water and to avoid walking barefoot to keep away from human or animal waste. If you stick to popular tourist destinations and major hotel chains, you ought to be safe, but many travellers are heading up the Amazon River where they may be exposed to malaria-carrying mosquitoes, he said.

Wise recommends travellers do their homework before departing. Inoculations may be in order, depending on the destination, the time that will be spent abroad, your accommodations and the exposure to impoverished lifestyles. Hepatitis, for example, is often associated with areas of high poverty and can be picked up from people handling your food.

Vaccines against Hepatitis A and B are available, as are inoculations to prevent yellow fever. Some countries may require travellers to show proof of inoculation against yellow fever. Malaria pills may be prescribed while some travellers might consider updating childhood shots against tetanus, polio and diphtheria, he said.

Considering a hypothetical example of someone planning a trip to Vietnam, Wise suggested the traveller get his or her tetanus, diphtheria and polio shots up to date, get inoculated against Hepatitis A and typhoid and consider a Hepatitis B shot if they are contemplating sexual encounters with strangers.

Government health plans do not cover costs of the shots, which can range in price from $30 for typhoid fever to $160 for yellow fever.

Wise would also recommend drinking bottled water or soft drinks, peeling fruit and vegetables, constantly washing your hands, bringing medication to treat diarrhea and taking along insect repellent. Anti-malarial pills, which kill the parasites

"I never leave home without my Personal Medication Info Card. After all, my life could depend on it!"
THIS CARD COULD SAVE YOUR LIFE!

Information card helps keep track of medications

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Ken Borden, an active senior who operates an advertising agency, began a project three years ago that could save many lives.

When he was 59 years old, the graphic artist came down with a severe cardio-vascular illness and "had to rely on various medications and many health- care professionals, doctors, doctors and more doctors."

He said they all asked him the same question: "What medications do you take?"

He never really knew, he said.

"I knew I took quite a few, but who could remember?"

So he wrote the names of all his medications on a piece of paper and the next time one of his doctors asked the question, he handed him the sheet.

"It worked," he said.

Borden soon realized that many other people also need this information at their fingertips. He began doing research, and came up with an idea for a personalized medication information card.

Borden's close friend Norm Shanker, a machine consultant with numerous medical problems, asked him if he could also have a card with his medications listed. Shanker was so impressed with it that he began collaborating with Borden on the project and suggested they open a business.

Today, the Personalized Medication Info Card Company creates laminated cards, the size of a credit card, that are printed on both sides with a complete list of medications, dosages, drug allergies and doctors and other health-care practitioners. It also contains the individual's birthdate, the times to take various medications, the date the card was issued and who to contact in case of an emergency.

Borden, 72, said he and Shanker are seeking to raise awareness of the card primarily among seniors, because they are the most dependent on medications and the most likely to have difficulty keeping track of all the information.

He said the card comes with a renewal form for prescription changes. Patients or their caregivers must fill out the form and send it back to him and Shanker, who then update the card.

Whenever any information is in doubt, Borden said, "I'll track them down, because you can't afford to be wrong about things like this."

He said their current goal is to help others rather than to make money.

"Updates are free of charge and the only charge is for postage and handling," he said, but added that when the business gets off the ground, they plan to charge a one-time fee.

"Some doctors' have requested that we bring the Personal Medication Info Card applications to their office so they can personally give the forms to their patients."

Borden said the card is a convenient way to store medical information, but "regardless of whether you arrange for a card, everyone should carry a list of the pills or medications they are taking."

If you are suddenly admitted to hospital, are on a routine dental visit, had an accident, or for any other reason require medical or emergency treatment, you need this information at your fingertips, he said.

When extra-lean is not lean enough

By LISA WEINBERG

About Nutrition

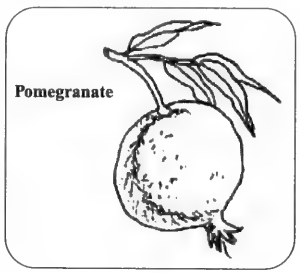
Q. My kids love burgers and I always buy the extra-lean ground beef. Is this lean enough if they eat ground meat about four nights a week?

A. Lean ground beef isn't as lean as you think, since 3½ ounces (about the size of a deck of cards) contains 16 grams of fat, a large part of which is saturated. Instead, try using ground veal, chicken or turkey, or use half beef with half one of these.

Q. I find that MSG bothers me. What is it exactly, and is it ever called anything else?

A. MSG (monosodium glutamate) does bother many people. It is, however, a safe ingredient in small doses. MSG is the salt of an amino acid, which brings out the flavour of certain foods. Read labels carefully, and if you are sensitive to MSG, you should also avoid hydrolyzed vegetable or plant protein, often labelled as HVP or natural flavouring. Tomatoes may also need to be avoided, as they too contain glutamate and can cause symptoms in some people.

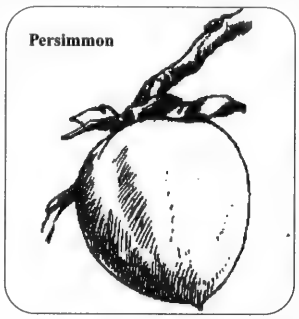
Q. I read your recent column on trans fats and am trying to eliminate the amount that I purchase and eat. How much is OK?



A. I think the best answer is that less is best. It seems unclear if there actually is a safe amount for intake of trans fats, or if so, what that amount is. What I suggest is to try, as much as possible, to buy foods without trans fats when grocery shopping, because you will likely consume some when eating out. For those who missed the first column, trans fat is the fat in hydrogenated oils, shortening, palm and coconut oils. It is a cause of heart disease and its intake should be limited.

Q. How can I tell from a nutrition label what the percentage of trans fat is in a product?

A. Currently manufacturers are not obliged to list the amount of trans fat in a product, although recent legislation will require this over the next few years. To find out the percentage, you can do a little addition. If a label lists that a food has six grams of total fat for example, and then lists how much polyunsaturated and saturated fat is in the food, and if those two numbers do not add up to six, then the missing amount is trans fat. Otherwise, look at the ingredients list to see which may contain trans fat.



Q. I am wondering about the calories in two exotic fruits that are in season in the winter – persimmon and pomegranate. Would you know the values of these?

A. Two great and delicious ways to get variety in the winter, a medium persimmon has about 18 calories and a medium pomegranate has about 104 calories. Enjoy.

Hearing from a Son's Perspective

Dear Hearing Solutions,

Thank you for helping my father with his hearing. He used to be known for always adding his "two cents" to the conversation, but over the years he became more of a sitter-and-watcher. Part of me thought it was just him mellowing. So when he announced he was going to visit Hearing Solutions, I thought it was just another sign of him slowing down. Now with his new hearing aid, I've been put in my place. So has everyone else who cares to hear his opinion. His witty remarks have made a reappearance at family gatherings. Maybe it's because you need to hear the conversation to make snappy comebacks.

Thanks for helping my father hear what he's been missing.

Sincerely,
Brad Felner

Retirement options?

Choose comfort, quality, service

A retirement living decision can be difficult. There are many options and it is important to find something that fits you and your lifestyle. Remember, not all retirement properties are created equal. Some people think that they may lose their independence or that they are just not ready yet.

However, Hazelton Place Retirement Residence, a unique home located on Avenue Road just north of Bloor, embodies a new approach to retirement living. "Our focus is on the individual and making sure that each person's needs are met every day," explains general manager Nadia Rahman. "Hazelton Place is truly a place to call home."

Physically, Hazelton Place certainly has all the comforts and warmth of a well-appointed, stylish home complete with a beautiful private garden and patio. Its real value, however, goes well beyond these elements.

"It's run like a first-class, small hotel" remarks Mrs. Suzanne Kergin, who moved to Hazelton Place close to two years ago. "You can live exactly as you've always lived. If you are going to live in a retirement home, you can't do better. We all agree on that."

"It's the individual attention we get and all the services which makes the difference," explains Mr. Sam Lipson, a three-year resident, who describes Hazelton Place as "a good place in every sense of the word."

Hazelton Place is managed by Diversicare Inc., one of Canada most respected management companies with a reputation for delivering the highest service standards possible.

Cuisine

What do you feel like today?

One of the toughest adjustments to retirement living can be the food. Meals often lack flavour, choices are limited, and it's simply not what you would serve at home.

At Hazelton Place it is recognized that meals are one of life's pleasures and healthy enjoyment of food is key to continued vitality. The Hazelton Place approach is simple — fresh foods, expertly prepared and beautifully presented in a comfortable setting. The focus is on stylish, quality, comfort foods, with plenty of options.

The results are delicious. Hazelton Place has earned a unequalled reputation for the high quality of its meals, offering a variety of menu choices. "The meals are absolutely superb. The soups are out of this world and rolls are served right of the oven," explains Mrs. Suzanne Kergin.

"I would describe the food as wholesome, healthy and interesting. It's certainly a full spectrum away from institutional," comments Dr. Julian Melzack, son of resident Rose Melzack.

Taking the culinary experience to the next level involves an ongoing attention to individual needs. The chef is more than pleased to prepare specialty favourites, sometimes using a resident's own recipe. Traditional favourites such beef brisket, potato kugel, chicken soup with matzo balls are featured, during the holidays.

Recreation

Enjoy Life. Live it now

Retirement Living is not about giving up the things you enjoy, it's about finding more. "My goal is to find ways for our residents to do the things they have always done – be it playing bridge, knitting, cooking, exercising or going to the theatre," explains Olga Stilos, manager of recreation services at Hazelton Place.

"There is no regimentation here. Everything is up to you. There is plenty to do, when you want to do it. You can live your life as you choose," says Mrs. Suzanne Kergin, a Hazelton Place resident for close to two years.

Mr. Sam Lipson is another resident who praises his experience at Hazelton Place. "I've had a great life, and am still living that life" explains Mr. Lipson, a long-time Torontonian who moved into Hazelton Place three years ago.

What's the Hazelton Place difference? "It's a matter of getting to know our residents and what they want. We talk, share ideas and come together," explains Ms. Stilos. "All our activities area focussed on the individual resident and what they want, often celebrating their traditions."

One example which Ms. Stilos likes to share is a comment a resident made after a group had gathered before Hanukkah to make latkes in our special resident gourmet kitchen area. "She said that being able to make the latkes with her friends took her back twenty years, making her feel twenty years younger," says Ms. Stilos. "It's very rewarding to be able to work with these wonderful people and help them stay active and continue the traditions which give them comfort," she adds.

Family

Relax, it's being taken care of

When Sam Lipson's daughter first came for a tour of Hazelton Place three years ago she had one word to describe it – "Wow!" Mr. Lipson moved in shortly after, settled in and now remarks that "this is home for me."

Hazelton Place is welcoming to family and friends.

Most importantly, the personalized approach at Hazelton Place, gives family members peace of mind. "The experience has been incredible for my parents and incredible for me as well," explains Dr. Julian Melzack, who lives in the U.K. and comes to visit his mother, Rose, several times a year. Rose Melzack and her late husband, Louis, moved in four years ago and were one of the first residents.

"This is a long way away from where I live, but it doesn't matter – I'm involved in my mother's care. The staff here does an excellent job of keeping in touch with me, and with my mother's physician. They readily establish a rapport," says Dr. Melzack. "There is nothing like this anywhere. It is fantastic value."

Hazelton Place is welcoming to family. Residents enjoy entertaining family and friends, both in the dining room or by arranging special functions in private rooms or lounges. Out-of-town visitors take advantage of furnished guest suites for overnight stays.

Medical

Care just for you, when you need it

Providing ongoing medical support and personal care to seniors can be challenging, and yet it is so important. Here again, Hazelton Place, provides a level of service which is a notch above.

"We make sure that every new resident has a personal care plan. We look at needs and then develop a program just for that person," explains Mr. Ron Khan, resident care manager at Hazelton Place. While many residents require no special care, others take advantage of specialized assistance services which are available as needed.

For example, an affiliated pharmacy does a quarterly medication review on every resident. This report is then given to the resident's doctor for review and discussion. Hazelton Place has its own physician who makes regular visits, or residents can continue with their own doctor.

Convenience of medical and other services is key.

Convenience of medical and other services is key. On site physiotherapy and chiropody clinics allow residents the freedom to seek treatment independently.

"Essentially, the Hazelton Place difference is a more personalized approach along with quick response and convenience," explains Mr. Khan.

Choosing healthy foods these days can be a dicey issue

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

So, what's for lunch? Beef is out. Salmon is a no-no. Tuna could be dangerous. Or is it? New studies have emerged recently about the safety of many of our most commonly eaten – and avoided – foods. Despite the hype, many of these foods have definite nutritional benefits, and dieticians admonish us not to cut them out entirely.

• Salmon and tuna: The recent uproar over salmon – and the news that farmed Atlantic salmon contains high levels of PCBs and dioxins – has led many to reach for canned tuna fish, which is low in fat and high in protein and heart-healthy omega-

3 fatty acid. But canned albacore tuna, previously thought of as a safe fish, is now being scrutinized for mercury as well. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration is considering putting labels on canned albacore tuna warning of the dangers of mercury, and is cautioning pregnant women to limit their intake to no more than 12 ounces per week because mercury can affect fetal development.

While Health Canada says current mercury levels in canned albacore salmon are below the limit of 0.5 parts per million, Leslie Beck, a registered dietician in Toronto and the author of Ten Steps to Healthy Eating, thinks that canned tuna is still something to watch.

"Tuna is a species of fish that tends to accumulate mercury in its muscle, and when eaten over time, the mercury can accumulate in us too," she says.

Beck advises against eating tuna sandwiches day in and day out, and suggests varying the types of fish you eat to limit exposure. Other safe and high-protein options are canned salmon (which comes from wild salmon), chicken and eggs (make sure they're graded). Nevertheless, in moderation, canned tuna is perfectly acceptable.

Meanwhile, the debate over salmon continues. Despite the warnings about farmed Atlantic salmon, Beck insists that the fish is still safe and we should keep it in our diets. For those who are still concerned, farmed Chilean and wild salmon both have lower toxin levels.

• Eggs: The Toronto Star recently reported that ungraded eggs have made their way onto the shelves of some Toronto grocery stores and restaurants. Because ungraded eggs are not inspected by the province's regulating facilities, there is no way to ensure they are properly washed and free of hairline cracks that can let bacteria in.

Toronto Public Health manager Jim Chan was quoted in the Star as saying that ungraded eggs pose an "extreme health hazard because droppings and dirt can contain diseases like salmonella or other pathogens."

To date, public health inspectors have found ungraded eggs at independent and specialty grocery stores and butcher shops. While no ungraded eggs have been found at any of the major supermarkets, it's still important to check your carton of eggs before you purchase them.

How can you tell which ones are safe? Make sure the carton says "Canada Grade A," which means they have passed inspection at a licenced facility, says the Canada Egg Board. And open the carton and check each egg to make sure that none are broken, splotchy or dirty.

• Coffee: A recent study by the Harvard School of Public Health found that people who drink more than six cups of coffee a day have a lower risk of developing type-2 diabetes. The study, published in the January edition of the Annals of Internal Medicine, found that men who consumed more than six cups of coffee a day had a 50 per cent lower risk of developing diabetes, and women 30 per cent. Ahmed El-Sohemy, an assistant professor in the department of nutritional sciences at the University of Toronto, speculates that the study has picked up on a link between caffeine and insulin absorption.

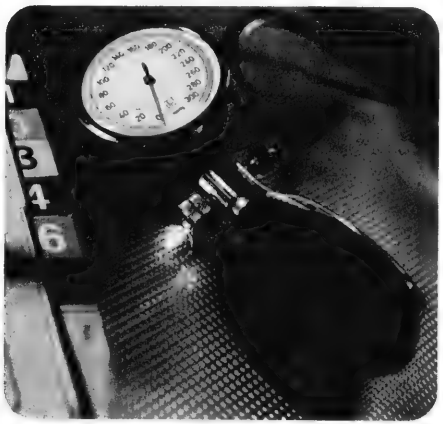
Heart care: just as essential for women as men

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Women need to take charge of their health and assess their risks for heart disease and stroke, says the director of the Cardiac Prevention Centre and Women's Cardiovascular Health at St. Michael's Hospital.



Dr. Beth Abramson, a spokesperson for the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada, says the reality is that heart disease and strokes are the leading health threat for Canadian women.

"[These] account for more deaths than all forms of cancer. Unfortunately, however, they are not our leading fear."

Ongoing public awareness is necessary, she says, in order to teach women that a well-woman check-up should include an assessment of the risk for heart disease. "It is important for people to understand the risks in general, as well as their own risks," she says.

"There is a striking epidemic of high blood pressure in Canada, and it puts people at risk for stroke and heart attack. The Heart and Stroke Foundation encourages people to know their numbers, know what is normal, and speak to their doctors about high blood pressure, which has no symptoms. That is why we call it the silent killer."

Having even one risk factor – a behaviour or medical condition that makes a person more likely to develop coronary heart disease – increases the chance of developing heart problems, as well as other potentially serious conditions such as stroke, congestive heart failure or kidney failure, says Abramson.

It is imperative for women to manage the risks they can influence, she says, such as high blood cholesterol and high blood pressure, or lifestyle factors such as lack of exercise, being overweight, smoking, drinking too much alcohol, stress or diabetes.

Risk factors that cannot be influenced include age, gender and family medical history. "If your mother had a heart attack before she was 65, or your father had a heart attack before he turned 55, you are at risk."

As a rule, she says, women are protected from heart disease until menopause, so their risks increase at mid-life. "Heart disease is an equal opportunity killer – it attacks men and women. We all need to lead a heart-healthy lifestyle in order to prevent occurrence.

"The good news is that heart disease is preventable and treatable. Manageable lifestyle changes such as routine exercise, watching food and reducing weight will lower the risks. [These changes] can result in changes in the inflammation of the blood vessel walls.

"The bad news is that heart disease is killing women because they are not aware," she says.

Dr. Elinor Wilson, chief science officer of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada and vice-president of the World Heart Federation, says more than half of female deaths and disabilities are the result of heart disease or stroke, and the incidence of other diseases such as cancer could be cut through a combination of simple, cost-effective national efforts and attempts by women themselves to reduce major risk factors.

A press release from Sunnybrook and women's College Health Sciences Centre alerts women to the possible symptoms of an impending heart attack, including unexplained fatigue, sleep disturbance, shortness of breath, indigestion or anxiety.

"Only 30 per cent of the women reported chest discomfort before the heart attack. They described the discomfort in terms like aching, tightness and pressure, not pain.

"[It is because of] this lack of significant pain that women may have more unrecognized heart attacks than men, or are mistakenly diagnosed and discharged from emergency departments. Many clinicians still consider chest pain as the primary symptom of a heart attack," the release says.

Adding nuts to your diet can help reduce cholesterol

So should we really be racing to the nearest coffee shop? Definitely not, says El-Sohemy, who specializes in studying the effects of caffeine.

"Not everyone responds to caffeine in the same manner."

Too much caffeine can cause bones to leach calcium, increase blood pressure and affect quality of sleep, says El-Sohemy. And women who drink more than three cups of coffee a day are at risk of developing osteoporosis.

"Make sure you are absolutely meeting your minimum calcium requirements per day," Beck adds.

Female coffee lovers should choose lattés over regular coffee and drink two to three cups of milk a day to counteract caffeine's calcium-stripping effect. Don't like milk? Try yogurt, cheese, canned salmon or bok choy.

As a guideline, Health Canada recommends no more than 450 milligrams of caffeine – or two small cups of coffee – a day, and less for pregnant and breastfeeding women.

• Avocados: Long considered a food to avoid because of its high fat content, avocados are making a comeback. Although they are the only type of fruit to contain significant amounts of fat, it is of the heart-healthy monounsaturated and polyunsaturated variety that helps lower cholesterol.

"They have healthy fat, the same type as olive oil," says Beck.

Avocados also have potassium, vitamin A and folic acid, which expectant mothers need for healthy fetal development.

"No other fruits have as much folic acid as avocados," says Victoria Jurgens, a registered dietician in Shellbrook, Sask., although fruits with smaller quantities are mangoes, grapefruit juice, cherries and bananas.

Calorie-counters still need to watch out. Avocados are rich in calories as well as taste. A California avocado has a whopping 365 calories and 30 grams of fat per fruit. Fifteen of those grams come from monounsaturated fats, and the other half from polyunsaturated fats.

A typical serving is 1/8 of a fruit, which equals about one serving of fat.

"Watch your portion and treat it as if you're adding a healthy fat to your diet," says Beck.

• Nuts: Like avocados, nuts have also been avoided by health-conscious eaters in the past because of their high fat content, but recent studies have shown that adding nuts to your diet can reduce cholesterol and lower your risk of heart disease.

Almonds, peanuts, walnuts and pecans all have essential fatty acids and unsaturated fats, says Jurgens.

"Research shows that people who consume nuts frequently – five times per week – have a lower risk of heart disease," she says.

Half a cup of almonds also packs in about 200 mg of calcium – about the same as 2/3 of a cup of milk. While peanut butter isn't the same as whole nuts, if you buy it, opt for the natural variety without hydrogenated fat.

The only nuts Beck recommends avoiding are macadamia nuts – usually found in desserts – because of their saturated fat content. One cup of nuts contains about 850 calories, so consume with care. A typical serving is about 1/4 of a cup.

"Take the calories out from your diet somewhere else and replace the white starch with nuts," says Beck.

'I want to eat and live like everyone else'

During eating disorders awareness week last week, much was written about what an eating disorder is and about the lack of proper treatment available for those who have the disease. However, very little was written about what it is actually like to fight this extremely misunderstood illness.

I have been battling anorexia and bulimia for the last 10 years. I am 24 years old, although I look much younger due to my stunted growth. My bones are similar to those of a 70-year-old woman. This is because I have osteoporosis as a result of years of malnutrition.

I never wanted to look like a supermodel, fit into a smaller dress size, or impress boys. Those things were never on my mind.

What I wanted was to disappear. I wanted my anxiety, my feelings of worthlessness and of not being good enough and my debilitating depression to go away. My eating disorder has been a way to numb my painful feelings.

Unfortunately, once the disease had a grip on me, I was unable to stop it. I have been hospitalized numerous times. I would put weight on in the hospital, usually by eating uncomfortable amounts of food and liquid nutrition. However, the underlying causes were not addressed, and I would often go back to my eating disorder symptoms.

Physically, my body has suffered from fatigue, weakness, electrolyte imbalances, and kidney, liver and heart problems. Emotionally, I am drained. I feel as if I have a civil war going on in my head 24 hours a day. The eating disorder is a monster to me.

On an intellectual level, I know that this illness puts my health at risk, but when I look in the mirror, all I see in an obtrusive, worthless person. Every minute of every day is a constant battle between my mind and my body. I want to eat and live like everyone else, but I have had this disease for so long that I do not know how to live, or even feel that I deserve, a normal life. My relationships have suffered and I have lost many opportunities and life experiences because I have been unable to rid myself of the monster in my head.

I would like to get well, but unfortunately there is a lack of treatment options. I was recently discharged from a hospital program because my body was not co-operating with the required one to two-kilogram requirement. Since then, I have been fighting as hard as I can to eat. I take it one day at a time. Sometimes the pain of this disease is excruciating, but I am lucky to have my family, friends and Sheena's Place to go to.

My story is not meant to make anyone lose hope. That would be unfair of me. I believe this illness can be treated if it is caught early and if the right resources are available. The main thing I want people to know about anorexia and bulimia is that it is not about vanity. It is not just about diet. It is a way of coping with feelings that are too painful. It is a real illness and can ruin lives.

As for me, I am not willing to give up without a fight. I plan to eventually win against this disease. I would like to prevent others from going through what I have gone through by sharing my experiences. I would would like to encourage compassion, empathy, patience and understanding for people who suffer from eating disorders.

I think we all deserve that.

Support groups essential for parents, families

Bill Coleman is the president of Family and Friends Against Disordered Eating (FADE), a new not-for-profit organization whose goal is to increase public awareness about the serious health risks of eating disorders, as well as the need to improve research, treatment and support services. The group also wants to educate the public about the need for more treatment and recovery facilities in Ontario, so sufferers are not sent out of the province or out of the country for care.

"The road to recovery is filled with too many missed opportunities, roadblocks and disappointments," Coleman charges. "That needs to change. We believe that recovery is possible and can happen sooner with the right supports and funding."

Ann Kerr, program director of Sheena's Place, a community-based centre in Toronto that offers support programs for people affected by eating disorders, talks of the need for a voice for parents and other family. Only they can "speak to the helplessness, frustration, fear and discouragement they experience in witnessing their child struggle with an eating disorder."

That often includes witnessing the child's up and down cycle of temporary recovery and rapid decline, Rosato says.

Besides supporting each other through their experiences, the members of FADE have more ambitious goals. Coleman says the group wants to lobby legislators for increased government funding for more hospital beds, outpatient and after-care programs, as well as for increased research and innovative approaches to treatment. It is also hoping to create a network of professionals and to make the public aware of the hardships of families and sufferers.

For more information about eating disorders, contact NEDIC at 416-340-4156. To find out more about FADE, or to help, call Elaine Goldberg at 416-665-9722 or e-mail info@fade-on.ca.

What can Botox® do for you?

Botox®, which is marketed as Botox Cosmetic® for cosmetic purposes, is a muscle-relaxing agent that has proven to be a safe and effective ally in the battle against the aging face. It smoothes out forehead wrinkles, frown lines (which can create an angry facial expression), crow's feet, and lines around the upper lip, and it can relax prominent neck cords. In addition, Botox® significantly reduces excessive underarm sweating.

What does the treatment involve?

Botox® is injected into a few points either in the skin or in the muscles under the skin. It takes less than 15 minutes to perform, and patients can resume their daily activities right away. Significant improvement is usually seen within a week, and the best result appears after a few weeks.

ACCREDITATION: Dr. Stephen Kraft is one of Canada's Botox® pioneers. In 1985, he became the first doctor in Ontario to use Botox®. Dr. Kraft has authored or co-authored more than a dozen publications on Botox®, and has lectured on that subject to Ophthalmologists, Family Physicians, Optometrists, Neurologists, and Allied Health Personnel.

Feldenkrais: a simple matter of reprogramming

By SHLOMIT KRIGER
Special to The CJN

Awaiting her husband's return home from work one evening, Maria Tiefenbeck stood at her kitchen counter making salad, when she suddenly felt pain trickle through her back and head. She sat down on the living room couch and stretched her arms up to help release the stiffness in her muscles.

Ten minutes later, she was back on her feet again with almost no pain, thanks to the new exercises she learned at her Feldenkrais classes.

Feldenkrais is a method designed, similar to the Alexander Technique, to change the way people move by literally reprogramming the body's involuntary system to help reduce or even eliminate pain.

"It helps many people," says Feldenkrais practitioner and teacher Leah Young. "I know people who swear by it."

Tiefenbeck, who suffers from Fibromyalgia syndrome, is one of Young's students. Fibromyalgia is a condition in which the body sends the brain wrong messages about the location of pain in the soft tissues of the body's muscles and ligaments.

"Feldenkrais was like a gift for me," says Tiefenbeck. "I can feel the difference in my body when I don't practise it."

She has been taking Feldenkrais classes for the past six years and likes the fact that she can practise the movements anywhere. She can also do some of the movements while lying down, which she finds easier to bear with her condition.

"I tried doing aerobics on television, but was later in terrible pain from stretching my muscles too much," she says.

The Feldenkrais method was developed more than 50 years ago by Russian physicist Moshe Feldenkrais. Born in Israel in 1904, Feldenkrais later moved to Paris to study mechanical and electrical engineering at l'Ecole des Travaux Publiques de Paris and physics at the Sorbonne, earning a black belt in judo in the meantime.

Following a bus accident in 1940, he felt recurring pain in his knee from an old injury. Doctors told him they could operate on his knee, but that there was only a 50 per cent chance for success.

Determined to fix the problem himself, Feldenkrias began exploring movement.

With knowledge of anthropology, anatomy, physiology and Zen Buddhism, he began to apply these principles to his own body. He looked at the human body as a system with the ability to regulate and repair itself.

Realizing that gravity has an effect on human movement, his first step was to create a new environment for learning new movements in which the body would get a chance to re-experience motion. To do this, he lay on the floor and attempted to recreate movements he usually did while standing or sitting.

He eventually regained full use of his knee and began teaching his method to others. A Feldenkrais guild was established in 1977.

Students are taught to pay more attention to how they move and which muscles they are using, and to move in a "new" way.

For example, the everyday movement of opening a door is not as simple as it looks. People usually use their wrists to turn doorknobs when opening doors, but, instead, students are taught to rotate their entire arm. The aim of the Feldenrais technique is to always move without wasted energy.

Dr. Moshe Feldenkrais

Feldenkrais died in 1984, after which the first Canadian Feldenkrais training program was set up. Now there are more than 22 Feldenkrais practitioners in Canada.

The Feldenkrais method is currently used by dancers, athletes and those with cerebral palsy, arthritis and other conditions, and is popular in Europe, Israel, Germany and the United States.

Feldenkrais also wrote a book, called Awareness Through Movement.

Young has been sharing the wonders of two methods of Feldenkrais with her students for the past 15 years.

The first, which has the same name as his book, involves classes through which the teacher directs a group of students to move properly. The other method, called functional integration, is a one-on-one session during which the teacher physically moves the student to free the body.

"Everyone does the movements in their own way," she says.

For more information on classes at the Antibes Community Centre in North York, call Helen at 416-665-9050. For other classes and locations, visit www.feldenkrais.com.

'This invention can save valuable time'

"It also saves [medical] staff wasted copying time."

As well, it is important when people travel out of the country, he said.

The duo is currently holding free clinics at local pharmacies, and they plan to make the service available at community centres, he said.

"We tried it on a variety of people, generally 50 plus – the pill people – and we held free info/card clinics where we explain the Personal Medication Info Card and showed them how to fill in the information on an application form for themselves, a friend or relative."

Borden said, "I believe that this invention can save valuable time when time is of the utmost importance, and it could save lives…

"The response has been phenomenal."

Walking is just what the doctor ordered

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Helene Griesman, a family physician in Thornhill, Ont., often prescribes a remedy that can't be picked up at any pharmacy. It's 30 minutes of walking, five times a week.

"I prescribe it almost every single time I do a physical [for patients who are not already exercising]," she said. "It's probably the easiest, cheapest thing to do."

In the 15 years she's been in practice, Griesman has noted an increase in the number of patients who are already exercising.

Doctors are also more aware of the importance of exercise, she said. At a recent family practice conference she attended, the consensus was 150 minutes of exercise a week as a general guideline, but when Griesman was completing her residency training and took part in a research project on "the exercise prescription," it was virtually "an unknown entity."

A regular walking program is beneficial for people who have a variety of conditions, she said. Among them are high blood pressure, high cholesterol, depression, arthritis, chronic fatigue, diabetes and osteoporosis.

"You definitely have to give exercise as treatment in a lot of [cases]," Griesman said. Patients with depression and chronic fatigue in particular have told her they feel much better.

An appropriate walking pace should increase one's heart rate so that "you can keep up a conversation, but it's a little bit harder," said Griesman.

From a Jewish standpoint, it is a commandment to stay healthy, says Rabbi Charles Grysman. He cites the 12th-century rabbinic authority and physician Maimonides, who wrote in Hilchot De'ot, as translated by the late Isadore Twersky, that it is "a man's duty to... cultivate habits conducive to health and vigour."

Rabbi Grysman, spiritual leader of Zichron Yisroel Congregation in Thornhill and a longtime walker, finds that aside from the physical health benefits, there are also spiritual and intellectual advantages to walking.

"I find, for me, it lends a certain focus to my day and makes me more productive intellectually."

He and his wife Lori, a teacher at Netivot HaTorah Day School, walk together 40 minutes a day, four to five times a week.

"It gives us time to relate," he said. "It's good for a marriage."

"People like to walk," says Tom Platt, manager of Fitness Depot in Thornhill. Of all the exercise equipment Platt sells, treadmills are the most popular, he said, particularly in winter when some walkers move indoors.

Platt has also noted an increase in the popularity of pedometers, small devices walkers can wear to measure the distance they've covered.

Toronto podiatrist Lloyd Nesbitt devotes a section of his website, www.lloydnesbitt.com, to choosing the right pair of walking shoes. Among his recommendations:

- Have your feet sized every time you shop.
- Allow a thumbnail's width between your longest toe and the end of the toe box on your longer foot. Have the sales person check the fit for you – if you bend over to check it, you will change the fit of the shoe.
- Your heel should not slip when you walk.
- People who over-pronate (roll in excessively) should look for shoes with added medial (inside) support.
- Under-pronators need shoes with more cushioning and lateral (outside) support.
- After you buy new shoes, go back to the store to try on a new pair of that same model about every three or four months, depending on the extent of your activity. You may not realize the extent to which your shoes have worn until you compare them with a new pair.
- For serious problems, consult a podiatrist.

Has the thought of taking a yoga class ever crossed your mind? Maybe word of mouth has made you curious about the yoga ads in the paper. Or maybe the desire for more flexibility in your muscles and joints has made you pay closer attention to the fitness classes available at your local gym. So pull up a mat, kick off your shoes and read on.

Nu, tell me, what is yoga?

Yoga is a fitness craze that has taken the western world by storm over the past few years, claiming to heal injuries, promote relaxation, and improve strength through a series of stretches and poses. Its roots go back many centuries to the Indian subcontinent, where it was a spiritual practice that encouraged meditation and helped balance the body and mind.

This sounds interesting. Where do I begin?

Yoga is all about variety, and different branches of yoga will produce different results. Some are better for gentle stretches, others will make you sweat.

Hart Lazar, one of Canada's best-known yoga instructors, has been teaching and practising for more than 20 years. He recommends shopping around for a teacher and yoga style that suit your needs.

- Ashtanga yoga is about training your body to be more powerful. The poses are quick and the workout is strenuous.
- Kripalu and hatha are more restful, combining strength and relaxation.
- Iyengar yoga focuses less on speed and more on precise poses and proper body alignment.
- Avoid bikram, which is yoga done in a room heated up to 103 degrees Fahrenheit. Not only does the heat make muscles more susceptible to injury, but it is a health risk to anyone with cardiovascular problems, says Lazar.

Although yoga promises many things – including increased flexibility, strength, muscle tone and relaxation – it isn't a panacea, warns Lazar.

Be realistic about its limitations, and work within what your body is capable of doing, he advises, and like any other type of exercise, consult your doctor before starting a new fitness program if you have any health issues.

Although yoga is generally associated with the eastern religions, Lazar insists that it can still be compatible with Judaism, and the poses themselves are religiously neutral.

"The average person isn't there to learn about Hindu thought. They are there for fitness and strength," says Lazar. While many yoga classes incorporate simple chants or meditation in Sanskrit, whether or not you participate in them is up to you, and Lazar advises to work within your comfort level.

That being said, the number of world-class Jewish teachers is huge, Lazar says.

Jews and yoga? That's pretty cool. Where can I learn more?

For more background on Jews and yoga, Lazar suggests the following resources:

- The Jew in the Lotus, by Rodger Kamenetz;
- That's Funny, You Don't Look Buddhist, by Sylvia Boorstein; and
- God is a Verb, by David Cooper.

For those interested in adding a Jewish flavour to their yoga exercises, Lazar has helped pioneer a form of hatha yoga called aleph-bet yoga, in which the yoga poses mimic the shapes of Hebrew letters. While there are no yoga schools in Toronto that teach aleph-bet yoga specifically, there are several books available with detailed diagrams of the poses, including Aleph-Bet Yoga by Steven Rapp.

You've convinced me. Where can I practise yoga in Toronto?

The advantage of yoga studios is that they often have more variety in their schedules and types of yoga offered, and many have introductory rates for the first class. If it's a studio you're looking for, Lazar recommends several:

- Downward Dog at 735 Queen St. W.,
- Yoga Sanctuary at 2 College St. or 348 Danforth Ave.
- Yoga Studio at 344 Bloor St. W. or 40 Eglinton Ave. E.

But don't feel obligated to try a professional studio. The best yoga class I've taken was at my local community centre. Most fitness centres, university gyms and community centres offer some type of yoga class. Check out different schools until you find something that suits you, your style and your budget.

New medical procedure shrinks fat cells

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Infusion lipolysis, a medical procedure that shrinks fat cells, is a safe and affordable alternative to liposuction, says cosmetic surgeon Dr. Stan Gore.

"It is a totally new medical science. Instead of removing cells surgically, physicians infuse medications directly into fatty tissue. Cells shrink as the excess fat disappears," says Gore, who developed the procedure and has been performing it since 1999.

Dr. Stan Gore

Gore, who sees patients at his Beach-area office, says one medical clinic procedure is required for each problem area, followed by daily application of prescribed creams.

For several weeks following the procedure, patients apply custom-compounded cream, he says, and then non-prescription cream is applied daily, indefinitely.

"We've designed products for a wide range of body areas and for all fat-reduction candidates, such as couch potatoes, or weight lifters who also suffer from exercise-resistant fat [ERF]."

ERF can be love handles, post-partum stomachs or on the thighs or arms, he says. "When people cannot make a dent in their problem area, they often turn to a surgeon.

Lipolysis

"Lipolysis, though, is a less intrusive, less expensive procedure. There is no recovery period, and there is a tightening and smoothing of overlying skin. Patients leave with a little bit of gauze [covering the area] and they go directly to work out, or to work."

The procedure is used for spot slimming, cellulite treatment or to shrink fat, he says.

"This is not a weight loss program. The best candidates are at a normal weight. We're not here to take away a huge amount of bulk, we're here to help contour the body," says Gore.

If people overeat, he says, they will put on weight in other areas of the body.

"Our treatment does not give people permission to overeat or remain inactive. If they exercise, fatty acids will be picked up by the muscles and the fatty acids will be burned. If they sit still, the fatty acids will accumulate in other areas.

"People who exercise will definitely see results," he says.

He gives each prospective patient a half-hour transdermal test, and if their fat level does not drop by at least 10 per cent in that time he does not recommend the treatment, he says.

"If we do take them on, within three months they should drop about one-third of their thickness.

"What really excites us is that lipolysis provides [one of] the only solutions for fit individuals with ERF. Within weeks of treatment, they can finally see the effect of exercise on areas that were unresponsive for years."

Lipolysis has benefits beyond a person's appearance, says Gore.

"The key predictor for cardiac wellness and longevity is related, not to weight, but to lean body mass. Thus, an overweight person with too high a percentage of fat carries much higher morbidity and mortality risks than does a person of the same weight with less fat and more muscle."

There is an "unending stream" of diet and exercise programs, says Gore, but there are very few fat loss programs and no effective methods of targeted fat loss.

"Our approach allows you to prioritize problem areas and attack them in sequence."

Want to lose weight? Stop smoking? Sleep nights?

Nancy Greenberg loses 20 pounds in 6 weeks

"For an entire year, I avoided going out. I dreaded parties and wore tent dresses. I had tried all the fad diets. My weight always came back. I was tired of counting calories. I own a restaurant and it was painful to watch everyone else eat all that mouthwatering food.

At Positive Changes, there was no pressure whatsoever. After my first session my food preferences changed. I lost 20 pounds in 6 short weeks. My dress size plunged from a tight 14 to a sleek size 9.

Don't carry that weight or stress any longer."

Alon Blumberger quits smoking, plays hockey again

"My goal originally was to just quit smoking, but I was able to reduce stress AND quit smoking during my program. Hypnosis worked for me. Hypnosis changed my life. I am now able to relax. I can sit through a session without fidgeting.

In the past I tried to quit smoking with the patch, but it worked for only a short period of time. Now, by quitting with hypnosis, I have no cravings. I have more energy and I'm playing hockey. I have started playing soccer again too. Why not try it – tell them that Alon sent you."

Harriette Brown Tabakman sleeps nights, loses weight

"I have a sleep disorder and was desperate to sleep better. I saw a Positive Changes ad in The Canadian Jewish News.

Restless Leg Syndrome is a horrible condition. I have a constant tingling in my feet. I noticed the changes in the first couple of weeks after I started my program. I am now able to relax. I sleep comfortably. I wake up with energy, ready to start the day.

I also lost 10 pounds, which I wasn't even trying to do. My subconscious prevents me from noshing. Why not give hypnosis and Positive Changes a try?"

Hearing loss affects more than just the elderly

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

What's that you said? Can you speak up? I can't hear you. If this sounds familiar, you're not alone.

Hearing loss is one of the most common health problems facing Canadians today, and as the population ages, it's becoming a greater concern.

According to Health Canada figures, one in 25 Canadians has some form of hearing loss, but seniors are the ones who suffer most. Less that one per cent of Canadians under age 25 have hearing difficulties, but nearly 50 per cent of people age 85 and older do.

Yet, recent studies have shown that many baby boomers in their 40s and 50s could also benefit from getting their hearing checked more regularly, says Dr. Dan Hancu, a family physician in Toronto.

Even young people of concert-going age are at risk for hearing loss. "Hearing loss in younger people is a result of being exposed to a lot of noise," Hancu says.

Loud concerts, blaring stereos and not wearing ear protection at work all contribute to the problem and the effects add up over time, he says.

However, age-related hearing loss is still what brings most people to Marilyn Pike, the director of audiology at Hearing Solutions, a Toronto-based company that outfits people with hearing aids.

"Seniors lose their hearing over time because of nerve damage as a result of aging," says Pike.

The most common form of hearing loss in adults is of the sensorineural type, caused by problems transmitting sound waves to the nerves in the inner ear. Other factors affecting hearing loss, aside from age, are family history and recurrent ear infections.

People with sensorineural hearing loss tend to turn the volume up on the television and have trouble hearing on the phone. They also complain that people around them mumble, and they often ask for things to be repeated several times.

In more serious cases, people with inner ear hearing loss can withdraw from social situations, Pike says.

While some types of hearing loss – such as scarring of the ear drum – can be corrected with surgery, Hancu says hearing aids are the main form of treatment.

The Hearing Foundation of Canada says digital hearing aids – a technological improvement over the old analog ones – have made wearing the devices less of a chore. They are better at recognizing speech, lighter to wear and adjust better to background noise than the analog variety.

One of the complaints that both Hancu and Pike hear most often in their practices is that patients don't want to be seen wearing a hearing aid.

Technological developments have produced hearing aids that are smaller than ever before, including some that are so tiny they fit into the ear canal and are invisible to the eye. Other larger models can be dyed to match the wearer's hair colour or the colour of their glasses frames.

New book helps families with seriously ill parents

By GAIL NARON CHALEW
The New Orleans Jewish News

When a parent falls seriously ill, even the strongest family is catapulted into a hellish, topsy-turvy world. Just when a child needs his or her parents the most, that is when the parents are least able to respond.

When a Parent Is Seriously Ill, a new book published by the New Orleans Jewish Family Services, is a compass through that world, providing needed direction and guidance.

Its co-author, Courtney Nathan, travelled through that world herself as a teenager when her mother developed breast cancer. She died when Nathan was 17.

"That experience colours everything I do or decide to do," Nathan says.

The book grew out of her personal life journey, coupled with her experiences and those of her co-author, Leigh Collins. Both are clinical social workers who help seriously ill people and their children cope.

Nathan and Collins originally intended to write a pamphlet that could be distributed to hospitals and physicians' offices. Yet, Nathan notes: "We did an extensive review of the literature and found that while there were lots of books written for parents who were sick and lots about children who were sick, there was only one book about how ill parents and their partners could talk with their children about the illness."

So, with the help of a grant from the Dora Ferber Foundation of Houma, a supporting foundation of the Jewish Endowment Foundation, they expanded their scope.

They conducted focus groups and interviews and surveyed parents in all stages of illness, their partners and children, and physicians working with the seriously ill. From this research came a practical, hands-on guide.

They write in the book's Introduction: "Experience has taught us that no matter how well children are prepared and how successful they are at coping, a parent's illness is always life-altering."

To help ensure a positive outcome to that life-altering experience, the authors provide detailed information about how children process emotions and what they are able to comprehend at different ages. One chapter is subdivided into infants, 2- to 4-year-olds, 5- to 8-year-olds, 9- to 12-year-olds and adolescents, and each section has these two headings: "What They Understand and How They React" and "How You Can Help."

- "By gaining the knowledge of what children can and cannot understand at each stage, parents can learn best how to talk to them about the illness," Nathan says. "And parents will learn not to get angry at what may seem heartless or selfish but actually are perfectly normal reactions from their children.

"We also wanted the book to be very user-friendly, so at the end of each chapter, we have a list of Dos and Don'ts. We want a parent to be able to pick the book up and say, 'Hey I can do that,'" says Nathan. "Many of these practical tips came directly from parents or older children who have lived through the experience and found they were helpful."

Some of the tips are helpful for all families, even before illness strikes.

"Having lost my mother when I was 17, I only had the opportunity to know her as Mom, not how she was as an adult," recalls Nathan. "There are so many things I wish I knew about her. So that is why, when I became pregnant the first time, and now when I am expecting again, I am keeping a journal. After 9/11 occurred, I wrote my daughter a letter, and I intend to do so when any significant event happens in our lives. I want my children to have some sense of who I am and what I want for them," adds Nathan.

She urges parents to do as much advance planning as possible.

When a Parent Is Seriously Ill can be ordered through the publisher, Jewish Family Service by calling 504-831-8475, by emailing jfs@jfsneworlean.org or through the Web site, www.whenaparentisseriouslyill.com that cause the disease, are also a good idea, he added.

Medical concerns often associated with tropical destinations

Medical concerns are often associated with tropical destinations, but more temperate locations such as Kazakhstan or Kurdistan can also be problematic. What's more, "tropical diseases are not necessarily tropical, but associated with poverty in other areas," he said.

Despite the medical risks associated with exotic travel, Wise pointed out "the greatest cause of death among travellers is not these diseases, but personal safety… I tell people to be careful, be careful, be careful, use your common sense."

Wise outlines this advice for the outward bound in The Travel Doctor (Firefly Books), a guide for staying healthy while abroad. It includes advice on diseases and other travel-related concerns such as jet lag, motion sickness, sun burn, intestinal parasites (worms) and other nasty occurrences that can sour a trip.

Back in the early 1970s, while a medical student, Wise learned first-hand how an illness can put a damper on an otherwise exciting travel adventure. He had gone to Bolivia because he wanted to see where American desperado Butch Cassidy had been killed, but he came down with the worst case of diarrhea he had ever experienced. It made him empathize with other travellers who were in rural locales, riding a bus through a remote corner of the mountains with no bathroom in sight.

The experience "just gave me a desire to learn more about diseases around the world," he said. On his return, he enrolled in a six-month program in tropical illnesses at the London School of Tropical Medicine.

Back in Canada, he began a family medical practice while also working part time in the tropical disease unit at Toronto General Hospital.

He left that position about six years ago to practice "travel medicine," advising and consulting with individual travelers and organizations such as CUSO and Ve'ahavta that send volunteers abroad. He also appeared on a radio phone-in show, Second Opinion, that aired on Talk 640 until four years ago.

There has been a major change in eating habits with the accent on food groups with low carbohydrate values.

Recognizing this trend and responding to the increasing number of customer requests, the Pickle Barrel has introduced a menu of entrees that will appeal not only to customers following a low carb plan but also diners who appreciate healthy alternatives to their current eating habits.

To design this special menu of entrees, the Pickle Barrel has retained the services of Rose Reisman a leading authority on the art of eating and living well.

Rose is a Registered Nutritional Consultant and author of 13 best selling cookbooks. As well, Rose has hosted her own cooking show for 4 years and appears regularly on Cityline with Marilyn Dennis.

According to Rose, reducing simple carbohydrates in your daily diet will not only induce weight loss, but can help in weight management, good health and disease prevention.

Israel decides to skip Hague fence hearing

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Top Israeli cabinet ministers decided last week that Israel will not participate at the hearing before the United Nations' International Court of Justice set to begin Feb. 23 in The Hague.

Palestinian officials immediately condemned Israel's decision.

"This is a recognition that the Israelis cannot face the international community and international law and justice," said Nabil Abu Rdeineh, an adviser to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

The Israeli government's decision was made hours after legal advisers recommended that Israel stay away from the legal proceeding, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office said in a statement.

"The ministerial team, headed by... Sharon, decided to make do with the affidavit Israel filed on Jan. 1, stating that the court does not have the authority to hold hearings on the fence," the statement said.

The legal team urged that Israel not take part in oral arguments before the court because that would lend legitimacy to a case they say is politically motivated and outside the tribunal's jurisdiction.

Alan Baker, the Foreign Ministry legal adviser, said that "after having examined all the written statements that were submitted by other countries, Israel does not feel it has anything to add."

Senate to examine anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It took Senator Jerry Grafstein almost 1½ years to convince his colleagues in the Senate to agree to debate his resolution on anti-Semitism, but the Toronto lawmaker believes the failure of the Jewish community to take up the issue has hurt his cause.

Grafstein has introduced a resolution that has been passed by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), where he serves as treasurer of the organization's parliamentary wing. The resolution calls on member states to unequivocally condemn anti-Semitism and to address legislatively the growing phenomenon.

CANADA

Medicare Pioneer Dies

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — Dr. Cecil B. Sheps, who helped create a universal health-care system in Saskatchewan in the 1940s – the model for Canada's national one – died last week at age 90. He first came to the University of North Carolina, whose Sheps Center for Health Services Research bears his name, as a professor in 1947. He also worked in New York and Boston and advocated a national U.S. medicare system.

WORLD

Coffee, Tea… or Jesus?

NEW YORK — A pilot on a Feb. 6 American Airlines flight from Los Angeles to New York suggested that non-Christians learn about Christianity, passengers said. The pilot asked Christians aboard to raise their hands and suggested they spend the flight discussing religion with other passengers. He then called non-Christians "crazy," a passenger claimed. Many on board tried to use cellphones to call relatives on the ground before the flight crew reassured them. The pilot, who had recently returned from a Christian mission to Costa Rica, apologized later in the flight. The airline is investigating.

Gibson Responds

LOS ANGELES — Mel Gibson says his movie about the death of Jesus is not anti-Semitic. "I've shown it to many Jews and they're like, 'It's not anti-Semitic.' It's interesting that the people who say it's anti-Semitic say that before they see the film, and they said the same thing after they saw the film," he said of The Passion of the Christ, which opens Feb. 25. He was speaking Feb. 8 to 3,800 guests at an evangelical university near Los Angeles.

Pay Back Loot: Panel

PARIS — France should pay the remaining $154 million (US) due to Jews whose property was looted in World War II, the government's Commission for the Indemnity of Looting Victims urged. A 2002 government report said 90 per cent of $1.5 billion in Jewish assets seized during the Nazi occupation has been repaid, the New York Times reported.

Iranian Held for Spying

ABUJA, Nigeria — Nigerian authorities are holding an Iranian diplomat caught staking out the Israeli embassy with a digital camera. Israeli security sources and Nigerian newspapers said last week that the man photographed the Israeli embassy and other sensitive buildings in the capital Abuja, including the British Council and the Nigerian defence ministry. Iranian embassy officials had no comment.

Terror Trial Begins

DUESSELDORF — The trial of two Jordanians and a Palestinian charged with planning attacks on Jews and Jewish targets in Germany began last week. It's the second case related to the Al Qaeda-linked El Tawhid terror group. The three were arrested in April 2002 after tapped phone calls alerted security agencies to suspicious activities. Another trial ended in a four-year jail sentence for group member Shadi Moh'd Mustafa Abdalla, 27.

Painting Withdrawn

LONDON — A Greek museum has withdrawn a painting from a London exhibit out of fear it will become subject to restitution claims. The heirs of Hungarian Jewish collector Ferenc Hatvany sought to claim El Greco's Mt. Sinai when it was displayed at the Metropolitan Museum in New York last month, but failed. The Historical Museum of Crete then pulled it from a show opening at the National Gallery in London. Hatvany's heirs are said to be planning to sue Sotheby's, which auctioned the work in 1988.

Rabbi Converted Jews

MEXICO CITY — Rabbi Samuel Lerer, who converted thousands of Jews in Mexico, died Feb. 5 at age 89. He had retired to San Antonio, Texas, but lived in Mexico City from 1968 to 1999 while leading the English-language Beth Israel Community Center. During that time, the Conservative rabbi reached out to Mexicans who believed they were descended from Spanish Jews forced to become Catholic in the Inquisition. He said he converted some 3,000 people.

Cemetery Apologizes for Burial Mix-ups

VANCOUVER — This city's largest and oldest Jewish cemetery has apologized to four families who found out the morning they were to bury loved ones that unidentified bodies were in plots they had purchased in advance.

After meetings with the board of Schara Tzedeck Cemetery and an arbitrator, the families affected each received a letter in December signed by cemetery co-chair Charles Diamond and newly appointed board member Rabbi Yosef Wosk, who called himself a friend of the support group for the families involved, the Western Jewish Bulletin reported.

The three-page letter said the cemetery's board and staff would work to make sure such problems never happen again and that "both the volunteer board and professional staff have undergone many changes in personnel and training."

Former cemetery funeral director Harley Felstein said in November that poor record-keeping or general disorganization over the past 30 years might have been to blame for the mix-ups. Concerns about the cemetery first came to light in February 2001, when local police began investigating the discovery of an unknown body buried on an undeveloped part of cemetery property. The body turned out to be a man who died of natural causes in a Vancouver old age home.

Sole shul in Saint John is for sale

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

There's a wistful quality to Ron Levine's voice. He knows it's the end of an era, but is disinclined to call it that.

"Everybody feels sad, but there's little to no chance of the community growing, so we had to do it," he allows. "It's not fair to those left behind, to leave them with a burden."

It even pains Levine to refer to the only synagogue in Saint John, N.B., as a burden, but not as much as ruefully noting that Congregation Shaarei Zedek, the sole shul in town, is up for sale.

Or as local realtor and longtime member Ellis Levine (no relation) put it to the Saint John Telegraph-Journal, "I feel like I'm selling off my roots, my heritage."

The problem in Saint John, as in so many other small communities, is a shrinking, aging Jewish population. The community, which peaked in the 1920s at 1,400, has dwindled to 85-90 active synagogue members, all in advanced years.

"I'll be 61 in May, and I was often the youngest one in synagogue," says the local-born and bred Ron Levine, who owns the local Union Deli, the only place in town that brings in kosher meat from Montreal. "We have people in their 90s. If we were younger, we'd have something to go on, but..." His voice trails off.

On Jan. 28, the congregation's board made the painful decision: the 85-year-old synagogue would go on the block. But an adjacent building, which houses the Jewish Community Centre and the Saint John Jewish Historical Museum, would remain in the community's hands.

Congregation Shaarei Zedek

The community centre houses a small chapel, where worshippers will meet – they already have been for awhile – once the synagogue is sold.

"We met in the chapel, especially in the winter, to avoid heating the synagogue," Levine explains. "We never had a problem getting a minyan for Shabbat. For the High Holy Days, we'd get 70, maybe 80 people." In other words, pretty much the entire community. If only other cities had the same "problem."

But Levine is realistic. Two of his three children live in Saint John, and that, he acknowledges, is not the norm. The prospects don't look good. The community is old, and there's no new blood on the horizon.

Canada's 2001 census showed 125 Jews in Saint John – a decline of 30 per cent over the previous decade – with an average age of 57.

The JCC also houses a Hebrew school, with 11 students, and a mikvah that's barely been used since it opened in the 1950s.

Prepare for the Hague shock

From the editor's desk

In just a few days, on Feb. 23, Israel will be in the dock at the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in The Hague defending itself against an accusing majority of nations in the UN General Assembly.

Last December, the General Assembly voted to have the ICJ consider the legality of the security fence that Israel has been building to prevent Palestinian terrorists from attacking Israeli civilians.

Many Jewish observers fear that the hearing will be become the occasion for an anti-Israel, anti-Jewish hatefest reminiscent of the shocking, deplorable display at the conference against racism in Durban, South Africa, in September 2000.

Imagine the scene.

Inside the stately chambers of the wood-panelled courtroom, 15 judges will bow and nod their dispositions with great courtesy and decorum.

Outside, on the cluttered, seething streets, a howling circus of angry demonstrators will vent their self-righteous rage decrying the "racist" policies if not the very existence of the Jewish state.

But both inside and outside, they will be doing the same work at the bidding of the same man – Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat – unjustly and hypocritically condemning Israel. The Jewish state will thus fall further in the minds and hearts of countless millions of people for whom the UN represents a moral high ground in the ongoing, international struggle to make the world a better place to live.

The impending proceedings promise to plunge the surrealism to even lower levels than we witnessed in Durban.

One thing, however, is certain. The proceedings in the court are not about the law. They are about politics. They are another tactic in the almost four-decades-old campaign by Arafat to delegitimize Israel and to bring constant international pressure upon the Jewish state. (See the Perspectives article by David Goldberg in last week's CJN.)

The court has been directed to consider the "legal implications of the construction of the wall on Occupied Palestinian Territory."

As Ed Morgan incisively points out in his essay on the Perspectives page in this issue of The CJN, the very language of the question proves the predetermination of the answer.

The ruling of the tribunal does not have any binding effect. But a finding against Israel – which, of course, is the expected result – will likely inspire more hostile, punitive resolutions in the General Assembly and perhaps in the Security Council as well.

The government of Israel decided last week to boycott the proceedings. It will present no evidence on its own behalf other than the affidavit it filed last month. The Prime Minister's Office explained why:

"The International Court of Justice has no authority to discuss the counter-terrorism fence since it concerns Israel's basic right to self-defence."

More than 30 countries have formally echoed Israel's argument.

They may not be happy with the existence of the fence or with its route. But they do not want the court to sit in judgment on a matter which they contend, at its core, is political and not legal. The future of the fence, while important, concerns them much less than the future of the court, which they know will be jeopardized by the precedent of this bogus hearing. Israel's refusal to present evidence at The Hague, however, is not indicative of its determination to find the proper balance of rights arising from the use of the fence as a security barrier for the protection of its citizens.

Last week, the Supreme Court sitting as the High Court of Justice concluded its own hearings of various petitions by individuals and organizations against the placement of the fence.

In the past, the justices of the High Court have vigorously defended the human rights of Israelis and Palestinians against unreasonable incursions by the state. There is no reason to doubt they will do so again.

The government has already said it is prepared to change the fence's route, if so ordered by the High Court, to reduce any harm occasioned to Palestinians. Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz has also promised he will take the necessary steps to solve any humanitarian problems caused by the placement of the fence.

The JTA reports that several groups plan to be on hand next week in The Hague outside the courthouse.

The Jewish Agency for Israel is coordinating a demonstration of nearly 2,000 European and Israeli students who will publicize the faces and the names of Israeli victims of terrorism.

ZAKA, Israel's domestic emergency response organization, plans to set up a display outside the courthouse that includes the scarred shell of a bombed-out bus.

"It is important for the voice of the Jewish people to be heard outside the Peace Palace," said Amy Goldstein, director of UN affairs for B'nai Brith International, referring to the building that houses the ICJ.

I applaud Goldstein's words, but would merely add that it is important for the voice of the Jewish people to be heard, period. The hearings will be a shock. And we must prepare. MBD

New program for Jewish professionals

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A leadership institute for senior Jewish professionals kicked off recently at York University under the auspices of York's Centre for Jewish Studies.

The three-part monthly series is the brainchild of Avi Benlolo, Canadian director of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, and Avrum Rosensweig, executive director of Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Having once worked together at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which has about 150 staff members, they realized that Jewish professionals who work at smaller organizations are "in a way isolated from professional development activities, and our organizations don't have the resources to facilitate them," Benlolo told The CJN. They also wanted to build collegiality and possibly start a local group that might expand to a national level, he said.

About a dozen participants turned out for the first of the monthly seminars, held in late January, to discuss "Jewish Ethics and the Jewish Professional."

The session, facilitated by Prof. Martin Lockshin of York, including discussions about hypothetical scenarios such as lunch programs that turn out to be on minor Jewish fast days and how far one's obligations extend to major donors.

Future sessions will focus on "Changing Trends in the Jewish Community" and "Professionals Communicating with Lay People."

Seniors learn computers at BJCC

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A new program at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) has seniors introducing other seniors to the world of computers.

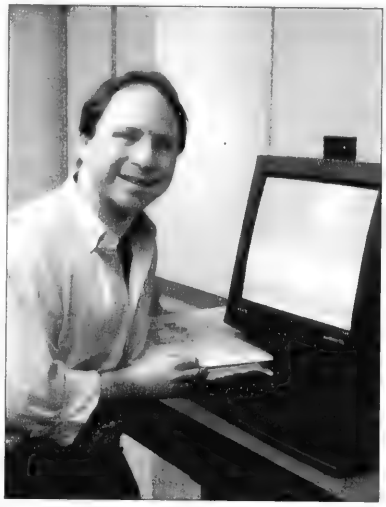
Instructor Brian Prosserman said he added the "twist" to his 16-hour course because he knew many seniors are reluctant to use computers.

"Computers were not part of their upbringing and for many, the Internet is something foreign. They are afraid to touch any buttons," said Prosserman.

"I wanted them to understand that this is something that is very do-able, and that there are other competent seniors who get great joy out of sharing their expertise.

"They need to see that at the click of a button they can go anywhere in they want. It gives them a whole new dimension to their world. Once they learn [the basics] and it becomes part of their life, they can move on. I would like to see them reach their relatives by e-mail, play bridge, or do online shopping or banking."

It's a win-win-situation, he said. "Not only does the student learn, but the teacher gets pleasure in teaching. It bridges the two worlds."



Brian Prosserman

The "senior coaches" are students who have worked with him, and Prosserman plans to keep training them.

"The volunteers will have all come through my program. Students are not required to become instructors, but the opportunity is always available. They can begin coaching when I am comfortable with their knowledge base."

The course is only long enough to learn the basics such as using the Internet and e-mail, Prosserman said, but the BJCC plans to offer further workshops.

"I'm taking the cue from my students. My goal is to create the desire to learn more, and then we will create further courses according to their needs.

"After we teach the basics and train volunteers, we can evolve into a mini-computer community. I want to create a spark, make them aware and entertain them."

He said it's very exciting to watch. "The seed has been planted, and now we are watering it."

Janet Klein Slavin, supervisor of 55+, the BJCC's department of adult services, said she has had "fantastic response to the program. Brian has created a comfortable environment, and he has conveyed the possibility [of learning computer skills.]"

Israel in better position since war, says analyst

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The American invasion of Iraq has dramatically shaken up the region, moderated the activities of Israel's opponents and made the world a safer place, says Mideast analyst Oded Granot.

Last year's war in Iraq improved Israel's strategic position by removing one of its foremost adversaries, said Granot, a journalist with Israeli TV network Channel 1, during a two-day visit to Toronto last week.

"Israel for years feared that Iraq would join with Syria and launch a war from the eastern side. This doesn't exist anymore."

But a precipitous American withdrawal could have calamitous consequences, marking a victory for extremists and leading to the increased use of terrorism, he said.

Iran, another of Israel's enemies, is now faced with U.S. forces on both its western (Iraq) and eastern (Afghanistan) borders, Granot said. As a result, its government has agreed to at least slow down its nuclear program.

"I wouldn't trust the Iranians to give up their nuclear weapons, but under pressure, they have mellowed down their nuclear threat."

Even Hezbollah, the Lebanese-based Islamic terror group, has felt the heat, Granot said. The United States has pressured Syria, Hezbollah's patron, which is in turn clamping down on Hezbollah. What's more, "Hezbollah itself understands that things have changed and it's looking at lowering its terror."

Granot, whose trip was sponsored in part by the Israel Now Consortium and the Canada-Israel Committee, spoke to a campus group, a synagogue congregation and to journalists during his visit.

He said U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell has handed Syrian President Bashar Assad a list of requirements. Among them: stop shielding the family of Saddam Hussein; shut down the Damascus offices of Palestinian terrorist groups; rein in Hezbollah; and withdraw from Lebanon.

> Hezbollah itself understands that things have changed

So far, the Syrians have complied in part, throwing out Hussein family members, reducing the activity of Palestinian groups and restraining Hezbollah. Assad has even put out feelers for renewed peace talks with Israel, Granot said.

A debate on whether to pursue the Syrian track in under way in Israel, with opponents suggesting Assad is too weak to make a deal, he said. Critics also argue that even a Likud government could not negotiate a withdrawal from the Golan Heights while it is proposing to abandon settlements in Gaza.

Granot, who has held a variety of top editing jobs with the Israeli daily Ma'ariv, said he would advise Israeli leaders to respond positively to the Assad overture. However, he added, "the main focus of Israel is to solve the problem with the Palestinians because Syria does not pose much of a threat to Israel now."

"The outline of the final solution is there, but the partner is missing," he said.

Granot said the Palestinian leadership under PA President Yasser Arafat does not want to recognize Israel as a Jewish, democratic state, renounce terrorism nor relinquish the so-called "right of return."

Oded Granot

Israel has failed to make Arafat "irrelevant" to his people, though it has succeeded in persuading the United States, the Europeans and even Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak that he is an obstacle to peace, Granot said.

The result is that the Palestinians' European benefactors are now questioning the use of their funds by Arafat, and the PA is scrambling to make its February payroll, which affects 40,000 security personnel. European donors are requiring that salaries be paid through legitimate bank accounts and not according to the old system in which recipients were paid with envelopes stuffed with cash.

Despite the appointment of two successive prime ministers in recent months, Arafat controls all aspects of the Palestinian infrastructure and even though he is not in good health, there's no indication he won't be pulling the strings for many years to come, Granot said.

Younger members of the Palestinian national movement and former prime minister Mahmoud Abbas seem to be more moderate than Arafat and are willing to compromise, but Arafat won't make a deal because "he doesn't want to be seen in history as the one who made concessions to Israel," he said.

For its part, Israel can pull out of Gaza, freeing up some of its military manpower, and contain Palestinian terrorists behind the walls of Gaza and the West Bank. That would relieve outside diplomatic pressure for it to do more while it waits for the younger generation of Palestinian activists to take power.

But, Granot cautioned, "any policy by a future U.S. president that would advocate pulling out of Iraq under pressure of terrorists would have very bad ramifications, including in Israel."

Still a noble pursuit

In a letter he wrote to Lord Grey de Wilton in 1873, Benjamin Disraeli, the witty, satiric English writer and novelist, who happened also to serve two terms as England's prime minister, described politics as "a career of plundering and blundering." The edge in his satire was all the more cutting for having been ground on the stone of his 19th-century reality. But were Disraeli alive last week, he would have surely shaken his head at the still applicable truth of his mordant observations.

Canadians were told by the auditor general, Sheila Fraser, that as much as $100 million was wasted by the last Liberal government in Ottawa through an elaborate ad agency "sponsorship" scheme. Much more, she wrote, was questionably expended from public funds. But $100 million, she said, seems to have been spent for blatantly political reasons with little or no return of actual value to the taxpayer.

As we await for the outcome of the public inquiry called by Prime Minister Paul Martin to investigate the shocking revelations, we can only speculate whether the abuse of public trust was negligent, reckless or criminal. We hope and trust the inquiry will be bona fide and that it will report to Canadians quickly so that the individuals involved will face the appropriate consequences.

But Canada was not the only place last week where holders of and aspirants to public office gave politics and public service a bad name. In the United States, the presidential race took a detour through the gutter. Supporters of incumbent George W. Bush and of the leading Democrat challenger, John Kerry, appear to have opted for campaign tactics that sling mud and personal invective. Each camp prefers to hurl insult and innuendo rather than to debate the substance of pressing issues. In Israel, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is still under police investigation for his role in certain questionable business dealings of his sons and allegations of kickbacks or bribes that his family may have received some years ago in return for political favours.

Respect for the rule of law is the irreducible minimum condition that gives democratic society the sinew and strength to withstand crisis, inspire confidence and command the loyalty of all of its citizens. But when lawmakers themselves disregard the rule of law, they weaken our society. And worse, their malign example can nestle where it dare not: in the minds of the next generation.

Woe to us if we and the next generation view public service as a merely a domain for the cynical and self-serving. Public office must be held in high regard and seen as a noble pursuit – not a career for the "plundering and blundering," but for the honest and well-meaning. The ideal qualifications for people who seek public office were listed, ironically, in last week's Torah portion. Such individuals should be "people of strength and virtue, God-fearing [that is, moral], people of truth, who hate corruption."

That may be more than Disraeli had in mind, but it is not less than the standard we need – and deserve.

New anti-Semitism on prime time

It interviewed a French rabbi who had recently been attacked by two Muslim males. The report noted a frightening rise in violent attacks on European Jews over the past year. Several prominent Jewish leaders in France and Italy who were interviewed argued that members of the extreme right and extreme left, coupled with Arab/Muslim hatred of Jews related to the Middle East conflict, were fuelling the fires of the new anti-Semitism.

I was struck that it did not take a "sensational" incident to get the new anti-Semitism on prime time news.

Canadians should ponder the fact that it took almost three years of virulent Jew-hatred, and at least a year or more of violent and vicious attacks, for prime time news shows to broadcast reports on anti-Semitism as a serious societal threat in Europe. A stark omission in the CNN report is the part played by the European media that thrive on vilifying Israel – the collective Jew – and that have helped facilitate a lethal environment.

Canadian leadership and the media have followed more closely on the heels of Europe, eroding our long-standing and trusting friendship with the United States. Now that we have a new prime minister, we should be crystal clear on what we Canadians expect of our leadership. Canada is either pro-democracy and pro-freedom or it is against these values that most Canadians believe in.

Since 9/11, we have witnessed a changing world – terrorism, radical fundamentalism, political extremism, lethal attacks on civilians, a UN that singles out one nation as evil, a growing uncivil society, rising dangers facing our university students, and, closer to home, hatred of the United States. If we remain silent, we will be called to account in the future. We need to stand up now with a call for action before we lose our country to a loud minority.

Hard decisions for Federation

In his Jan. 8 column on Jewish education, Seymour Epstein, vice-president of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, rightly expresses concern that less than 50 per cent of Jewish children are in Jewish schools at any one time. He also draws attention to the lamentable fact that only 4,000 out of 15,000 teens are exposed to any Jewish content through youth groups, camps and supplementary programs.

One may infer from Epstein's statistics, as well as others, that there are many parents who would like to send their children to Jewish supplementary and day schools as well as cultural institutions, but cannot afford to do so.

The BJE is confronted with the challenge of disbursing funds in an equitable manner among various denominational groups – that is, Orthodox, Conservative and Reform – and scholastic institutions. Perhaps some of these groups could do more to encourage their less affluent members to apply for financial assistance from the BJE.

Also, available statistics raise the question of whether funds are being distributed as equitably as they might be among the various groups. Again, is this a matter of some groups being more effective advocates on behalf of their less affluent members than others?

Furthermore, should the UJA Federation allocate more of its funds toward Jewish education and culture rather than infrastructure-building? The federation is doing an admirable job in trying conditions, but more needs to be done. Some hard and difficult decisions are called for.

Answers Rabbi Morrison

Had Rabbi Howard Morrison been present at my address at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, he might not have felt it necessary to reply in such a manner. ("Transcend denominational rhetoric," Letters to the Editor, CJN, Feb. 5).

The historical portion of my speech, largely ignored in The CJN article, analyzed the process by which the Conservative movement came to attract the largest number of synagogue-affiliated Jews in our community. I demonstrated, in detail, that this phenomenon had more to do with economics and the search for decorous services than with ideology. The perception of the Conservative movement by the laity had nothing to do with Halachah.

I showed also that the Conservative movement has proceeded to drift increasingly away from the principles of its founders and of the outstanding figures of the Jewish Theological Seminary, many of whom were the teachers of its current rabbinic leaders.

My critique of Conservatism was not gratuitous, nor did I spitefully use "denominational rhetoric." Those who know me will attest that I am open to all Jews, wherever they may stand in the religious or secular spectrum. They also know that I have cordial relationships with Jews across that spectrum, something I value and hope to maintain.

I spoke, rather, out of ahavat Yisrael, from concern for our common destiny as partners in a covenantal relationship with God. I spoke, in short, as a member of the "family" and in my sadness that, try sincerely as it might to adhere to tradition, the Conservative movement has fallen victim to the tendency to measure Torah by the demands of western society, rather than the reverse.

With respect to Rabbi Morrison, and to other Conservative rabbis in Toronto whom I recognize are personally observant Jews and whose children reflect that fact, the concept of "halachic pluralism" remains nonetheless an oxymoron.

While rabbinic literature is replete with differing opinions, major differences are seldom reflected in the practice of traditional Jews. The introduction of significant departures in the guise of Halachah is what creates division – indeed, denominations – and that does not augur well for our collective family.

Hak'n the great wall of chainik

By ED MORGAN

On Feb. 23, the International Court of Justice (ICJ) will consider the question of Israel's security fence designed to physically separate most Israelis from Palestinians in the West Bank. No one has actually sued Israel – only another state can do that and the Palestinians do not qualify on that score. Rather, the General Assembly has turned to the ICJ for an "advisory opinion" on the following question: "What are the legal consequences of Israel's building a wall in the occupied Palestinian territories?"

One might be tempted to dismiss the entire exercise with a Seinfeldian "yada, yada, yada." After all, the ICJ is the judicial arm of the United Nations, whose Human Rights Commission (UNHRC) two years ago endorsed anti-Israel violence in a way that the leading human rights NGOs – Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch – have steadfastly refused to do. In the wake of the Passover attack on Netanya's Park Hotel, the UNHRC in April 2002 echoed the General Assembly in affirming the right of Palestinians to "struggle against foreign occupation by all available means, including armed struggle." It is easy to conclude that pronouncements from UN related institutions are just so much banging on a teapot – meaningless, if headachy, noise.

Nevertheless, the ICJ is a more prestigious, and generally a more politically neutral, body than its sister institution the UNHRC. It is therefore prudent to take its deliberations seriously when they tread on an issue close to Israel's heart. The problem here is not so much that the UN's judicial body is biased against Israel, although the court's refusal of Israel's request to remove the outspoken Egyptian judge from the case is troubling. Rather, the problem is that the law itself may be irredeemably jaundiced.

Israel's case on the merits relies on the court understanding two basic points. In the first place, the territories must be characterized as being in dispute. There is little doubt that a sovereign state can fence off its border with a neighbouring territory, and there is equally little doubt that one state cannot encroach on the territorial sovereignty of its neighbour. Secondly, it is important for the separation to be characterized as a temporary rather than permanent structure. Once again, there is little doubt that an occupying power can protect itself by establishing defensive installations in territories that its military controls, and there is equally little doubt that nothing can be done by the occupier to erect structures that change the contours of the territory in question.

In other words, the General Assembly, in posing its question to the ICJ, has pre-determined the outcome. If the structure is a "wall" instead of a "fence", and the territories are both "occupied" and "Palestinian" instead of "disputed," there is little doubt as to what the "legal consequences" might be. If only Judge Lance Ito had been asked for his advisory opinion on the legal consequences of O.J. Simpson stabbing his wife to death, the case would have come out the way the prosecution had planned. Israel's hand will fit the glove that the General Assembly has stitched together, and if the glove fits, the court certainly won't acquit.

The primary complaint about the fence has been that it follows a route that encroaches on territory deep in the West Bank instead of hugging the "Green Line." Even the Bush Administration has admonished Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon about the proposed detour of the fence from the pre-June 1967 border in order to encircle the town of Ariel and other Jewish settlements built on territory captured from Jordan during the Six Day War. The suggestion is that it is not the fence that offends, but rather its peculiar location, and that the combined concrete and chain-link installation will effectively demarcate a new border rather than help defend the old one.

Whatever the merits of that viewpoint as a matter of contemporary realpolitik, it is unlikely to matter in terms of the law. Demarcating the legal border between Israel and the entity to its immediate east is a remarkably complex matter. The fence, even with its problematic location, simply does not raise the type of problem that, say, an American fence built along the 50th rather than the 49th parallel would raise. We know where the international border between Canada and the United States lies and can measure with precision any deviation from this long-recognized boundary. For that reason, the ICJ was a perfectly appropriate forum to arbitrate maritime boundary disputes between the two countries in the Gulf of Maine. It applied the principle that the sea boundary is a natural extension of the land one, and the question was thereby resolved.

Palistinians demonstrate near Abu Dis. The primary complaint has been that the fence follows a route deep in the West Bank instead of hugging the "Green Line."

With Israel, by contrast, all one can say is that all parties are swimming in a sea of confusion. Whatever else is true of the Green Line, it is certainly not a legal border. It was, and remains, nothing more than the line marking the outer limits of the Jordan's 1948 invasion of the territory of the former British Mandate for Palestine. If one takes the 1947 General Assembly Partition Plan as a starting point, the West Bank from 1948 to 1967 was territory occupied by the power to its east every bit as much as it became in 1967 territory occupied by the power to its west. This fact was acknowledged, albeit inadvertently, by the Jordanian representative to the UN on May 31, 1967, a week before the West Bank changed hands, when he proclaimed to the Security Council, "I know of no boundary. I know of a situation frozen by an armistice agreement."

The fact is that there is no legal border, and at the same time Israel is a sovereign state entitled to secure its border with a perimeter wall or fence of its own design. The law, in other words, is in a state of "Paradox Lost," while Israel, the metaphor would suggest, is condemned to the purgatory of ongoing exposure to terrorist attacks. It's not the location of the wall that has legal consequences, it's the existence of the thing itself.

Since the ICJ's starting point is a question that defines the territories as occupied, it behooves any analyst to ask about the precise nature of the occupation and the powers that flow from the occupier's status as such. United Nations personnel have confirmed that Israel's occupation of the West Bank arose as a defensive one. The chief UN truce supervisor in June 1967 was Norwegian Gen. Odd Bull, perhaps the most appropriately named UN official in the history of the world body. Gen. Bull, in a straight-shooting interview that he saved for just after his retirement in 1970, confirmed that as late as the morning of June 5, 1967 – the first day of the Six Day War, before fighting erupted on the Jordanian front – he personally conveyed to Jordan's King Hussein an Israeli offer of a peaceful resolution to the crisis.

It is generally accepted in international law that an occupying power who takes control following a defensive war can establish defensive structures in the territory for the duration of the occupation. If we are to take the law seriously, we also must concede that an occupying power is obliged to treat the population of the territory benevolently, disrupting civilian life as little as possible. The Israeli government's announcement this week that it will redraw the route of the security fence in order to ease mobility restrictions on the Palestinian population should therefore improve the country's field position in the earnest game of international debate. Israeli security is not increased by imposing hardship for its own sake. Like the Great Wall of China, the idea should be to fortify civilization against those who would destroy it, not intrude on life in towns and villages beyond the perimeter.

It may be, of course, that no matter what Israel does, the advisory opinion will turn out to be more of the UN's odd bull. The prejudicially phrased question suggests that the opening coin toss has already gone badly, and that it is politics, not principles, that will rule the day in court. Even so, the process is a serious one, and Israel has managed to amass a surprising amount of support in The Hague (30 countries at last count). There may be a slim chance of a surprise win, although the contest of international law can be a frustrating one. Instead of the Grey Cup, we may get back nothing but draikop.

My new hero

I'm turning 40 this week. I guess that means I'm middle aged. Truth is, I don't feel all that different, nor have I experienced a sudden urge to buy a sports car. But I do have a new hero, or to be more precise, I've rediscovered an old hero: Rabbi Akiva.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Akiva was an uneducated shepherd who commenced his Torah studies at age 40. Completely illiterate, he had to go back to first grade and study the alephbet. Through sheer determination, he quickly overcame his lack of knowledge and became the greatest rabbi of all time.

As an elementary school student, I understood the Akiva story as a parable about persistence. Its message was that even Akiva, the illiterate one who thinks he's stupid, is able to succeed if he is willing to work hard. It taught me that diligence is just as critical as high intelligence.

Today, I've reclaimed the Akiva story for a new lesson. At middle age, coasting becomes a serious temptation. Seniority often bring success, and success makes it easy to lose your edge. You become risk averse, you refuse to accept new challenges and avoid difficult situations. You "settle down" and consider it a blessing that you no longer need to struggle. In short, for many of us, 40 is the age of the status quo.

I, too, am tempted by the pleasant inertia of the status quo. Why not? The status quo keeps your blood pressure down and reduces stress. But whenever inertia sets in, I remember Akiva. Akiva now teaches me that 40 need not be "middle age," an era intended exclusively for continuity, conservatism and conformity.

Yes, Akiva could have played it safe and sated his hunger for knowledge with a few Hebrew lessons. But then he would have lived out his life in anonymity as just another forgotten shepherd. Instead, Akiva started over, went back to first grade, and transformed his entire life. And that's exactly why he's my new hero – because he reminds me that 40 is an excellent age for new beginnings.

First graders are used to new beginnings. For them, every day is a tour de force, filled with new exploits. Unfortunately, as we age, we teach ourselves to resist the unfamiliar, and we drain away our natural enthusiasm. But if he chooses to, a 40-year-old man can be as adventurous as a first grader. And that is exactly what Akiva did: he went back to first grade and rediscovered his sense of wonder. I believe that ultimately it was Rabbi Akiva's Grade 1 skills that enabled him to become a great man.

So, now I'm a middle aged man. But that doesn't really matter. Like my new hero, Akiva, I'm still a first grader at heart.

Building a living bridge

"When do we go to Be'er Sheva?" our children kept asking during our recent trip to Israel. We were waiting for Israeli schools to resume after Chanukah. Our eight-year-old daughter Lia, a third grader at Akiva School, and our six-year-old son Yoni, wanted to visit their pen pals at Akiva's "sister" school Ma'anit in Be'er Sheva, Montreal's sister city.

Gil Troy in Montreal

On the appointed day, we dropped off both children at their respective classrooms with their lunches and improvised pencil cases. Lia, who had visited the year before too, ran off with her buddies. We did not see her again until school ended. She would later report that she learned English – they practised "Mom," "Dad," "sister" and brother" – as well as computers, science, art and Torah. Lia noted that one student, Ayub, an Arab, learned about the 10 Plagues with the rest of the class – a welcome reminder that Israel is more diverse and multicultural than the world acknowledges.

"It felt good to see my pen pal and my Akiva friends' pen pals," Lia said. "It was special to see how they did things differently. It felt kind of strange because we were outside so much even though it was winter."

Our first grader, Yoni, had not yet met his pen pal, Re'em. When we entered the class, Re'em was having a tiff with a friend. When he realized that he had a visitor bearing a Montreal Canadiens shirt for him, he smiled and hugged our son. Yoni also learned English that day. He walked away impressed with how well Israeli kids speak English, having been swept up into a game of catch by some girls who insisted on practising the language on him.

"I got to go to school while I was on vacation, which is kind of crazy," he said, itching to return.

The challenges facing Israel today have re-emphasized the long-standing question of how to develop friendships between North American Jews and Israelis. This school pen-pal program, part of the Jewish Agency for Israel's Partnership 2000 program and sponsored by FEDERATION CJA, is a model of mutuality. Through this program, our children have learned the values of tzedakah. Inspired by our visit last year, and regretting that birthdays often degenerate into materialistic gift exchanges, we began donating what we usually spend on birthday presents and bar mitzvah gifts to Ma'anit. When invited to a party, we gave tribute cards instead of traditional gifts, explaining that the money would help sponsor Ma'anit's art day, a lovely program endangered in this era of budget cuts. Similarly, a family we know just celebrated a grandfather's 65th birthday by donating a resource room in his honour for special education teachers in Be'er Sheva's Montreal-financed Greenberg Education Centre.

But more important than the little tzedakah we have given is the invaluable gift we have received. We have found real friends in a real country beyond the headlines and beyond the abstractions, and we have forged a special connection to one group of kids in one school in one community. We have also seen Birthright participants befriend students from Be'er Sheva in their short visits to the city, and some even made aliyah there, either individually or as part of a garin, a group of magshimim (fulfillers). We have seen friends such as Nancy Gold and Andrea Freedman return glowing from a week of chores to help establish a new pioneering community called Givot Bar – we dare not call it a settlement – outside Be'er Sheva. In the traffic back and forth between our two cities, we have learned that more is more: the more you give, the more you get, and the friendships flourish.

Hanging on one of Ma'anit's walls is a peace quilt with patches made by dozens of different Akiva families quilted around the slogan "Am Echad, Lev Echad" – one people, one heart. We feel proud to be a part of a people who build bridges of peace with each other, and even now, amid such troubles, seek to create a common constructive language of love and friendship. Our two oldest children are already preparing the return visit – and our two youngest, pre-school children are clamouring to get in on the act. We are thrilled to oblige – for our own sakes.

Last week, I became Canadian. Together with 79 other immigrants from 39 countries assembled in a Toronto courtroom, I received the great gift of Canadian citizenship. Some had travelled a long and dangerous route to that courtroom. Others had simply stepped north across a gentle border. The citizenship judge, herself an immigrant, administered the oath of citizenship, welcoming us into the "Canadian family." In that magical moment, we became one with Canada.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Suddenly we acquired a new set of spiritual ancestors, a history, a future. In that instant, the fur traders, the Métis, the coureurs de bois, became mine, part of the past I share with other Canadians. Thus immigrants become Canadian, absorbing Canadian ways.

As for me, in taking on the Canadian experience, I also take on the Canadian Jewish experience, a mixed history of haven, hostility and hope.

The Oath of Citizenship is a rite of passage. Like all such ritual, it formalizes a commitment that is already present, whether to another person or to a system of laws and values. Rituals help to clarify a liminal state, an in-betweenness. In reality, these transitions are more gradual. They happen over time – the decision to love and share one's life with a partner, to embrace the destiny of the Jewish people, to love and raise a child, to bind one's future with the future of a nation. Rituals help solidify us in our new status.

Naturalization shares some similarities with conversion, with becoming a ger, a Jew by choice. Indeed, in its origins, the word ger referred to an immigrant, one who sojourned among the Israelites and adopted Israelite values. Both the new citizen and the new Jew take on a commitment to learning and practice. Both acquire privileges and rights. Both worry about fitting in. To equalize Jews by birth with Jews by choice, traditional Judaism forbids identifying converts as such. Synagogue practices hint at their origins nonetheless, calling them to the Torah as children of Abraham and Sarah.

The citizenship judge who presided over my ceremony noted that we were now like any other Canadian citizens. While this is true at the level of rights and responsibilities, it is also true that the immigrant's relationship to this country is different from that of the native child. Paradoxically, naturalization involves a denaturalization, a kind of self-consciousness about society and one's place in it. Social habits and customs may not seem inevitable, but must be observed and learned. This insider/outsider aspect of the immigrant experience brings with it a particular mindfulness. It gives the new citizen an appreciation for – as well as the proclivity to question – things that the native child takes for granted. I ponder the meaning of Canadianness; my Montreal-born husband has no need to.

Remembering one culture while participating in another, the immigrant may have a freshness of vision when looking at old problems. And so, too, with Jews by choice. In my experience, for example, Jews are notoriously reluctant to talk about God. Even (or perhaps especially) observant Jews rarely talk theology. When I was in graduate school, the members of my chavurah jokingly referred to this as our embarrassment over the G-word. Jews by choice talk about God, and, in so doing, bring the rest of us to think theologically. In that sense, the gift of citizenship that Canada confers on Canadians by choice brings the country the gift of diversity, a human richness. This is why the judge, in conferring upon us Canadian citizenship, thanked us for choosing Canada.

Sitting in the courtroom last week with 79 other new Canadians, listening to the welcoming words of the judge and the clerk, I could not help but cast my mind back 60 or 65 years. Imagine if Canada had been so welcoming to Jews in the late 1930s and early 1940s. Imagine if the refugees of Europe could have chosen, as I have. How many Jewish lives would have been saved – Jews whose descendants today would be good and productive members of Canadian society. The loss to the Jewish people is incalculable. It is Canada's loss, too.

Looking around me at the new face of Canada, I understood something about becoming Canadian. To become a citizen is to accept and affirm the ideals and values of the country, to invest in the system. And then, because no human system is perfect, it is to work to improve and reform what must be changed.

Auschwitz made Primo Levi into a novelist

Crushed by the weight of his Auschwitz memories, Primo Levi, normally a shy, reclusive, silent man, could think of only one remedy: talk. His obsessive need to tell people about his terrifying experiences in Auschwitz, the central experience of his life, was a form of therapy.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Conversation enabled Levi to liberate himself from an emotional burden and better understand his suffering. Encouraged by friends, who had been riveted by his tales of survival, Levi poured his feelings on to paper, and wrote If This Be A Man, his first book, published in 1947.

Written in a direct, dry style, If This Be A Man was an account of life and death in Auschwitz. One of the first novels to grapple with the Holocaust, it was an international best-seller, thrusting Levi into the ranks of literary stardom.

He would write more novels on the Holocaust – The Truce, The Drowned and the Saved, If Not Now, When? and The Periodic Table – all of which earned him a reputation as one of Italy's finest writers, but never a Nobel Prize for literature. As if to repent for its poor judgment, the Nobel committee recently awarded the prize to Imre Kertesz, whose novels, Fateless and Kaddish for a Child Not Born, recall the Holocaust in Hungary.

Carole Angier, Levi's latest biographer, claims he probably would never have become a novelist had it not been for Auschwitz. "So Levi often said," she writes in The Double Bond, published by Farrar, Straus and Giroux and distributed in Canada by Douglas & McIntyre. "It was both true and not true."

Without Auschwitz, she explains in this complex but irritatingly meandering biography, Levi would not have broken out of the bounds of essays, short stories and poems.

He was born in the northern Italian city of Turin in 1919, and lived there until his abrupt and untimely death. Levi's parents were middle-class Jews whose ancestors had previously been observant. Like many Piedmontese Jews, his forebears had probably come from Spain or Portugal after the Inquisition.

As Angier notes, the ghettos of Piedmont were the last to be enclosed and the first to have been opened. The ghettos were dismantled during the Risorgimento, the movement of Italian independence and unification, which began in Turin. The Jews of Turin were in a peculiar position – integrated yet unassimilated, accepted but apart.

Reserved and introverted, Levi was irreligious. But in fascist Italy, after the passage of the 1938 anti-Semitic laws, he was certainly an outsider and, soon, a persona non grata. Curiously enough, Levi felt more Jewish after the passage of these edicts, which, as a sop to Nazi Germany, gutted careers and turned lives upside down.

The racial restrictions did not, however, destroy Levi's prospects at the University of Turin, which he entered in 1937. The decrees stated that Jewish students who had already begun their studies were entitled to finish them. Levi studied chemistry because, as he would later say, it smelled clean and was an "island of reason" in a politically oppressive state.

Predictably, there was no job for him after his graduation from the Chemical Institute in 1941. But thanks to a sympathetic acquaintance, he found employment in a mine under an assumed name.

He did not stay for long. Levi joined the partisans in the Piedmont mountains. Captured by the fascists, Levi was interned in the Fossoli concentration camp, near the resort of Capri. He was treated decently before being transported to Auschwitz.

As fate would have it, Levi was not swallowed up by Hitler's gas chambers. A fellow chemist saved him from certain death by letting it be known that Levi was his assistant. Levi, whose tattoo number at Auschwitz was 174517, had a knack for attracting sympathy. But fortitude was the key to his survival.

Assigned to a labour camp at Monowitz, one of some 45 sub-camps attached to Auschwitz, he toiled in a synthetic rubber plant bombed incessantly by the Allies and in muddy fields, loading and unloading coal, cement and gravel. He suffered from pain, cold, hunger and exhaustion.

When the Germans abandoned Monowitz, in the face of the Red Army's advance, they left behind 800 prisoners. Hitler had ordered their murder, but in the chaos of Germany's retreat, Levi was given a new lease on life.

Liberation came just in time. He was on the verge of physical collapse when the Soviets arrived. Levi fell into a state of semi-consciousness and was confined to bed for a month.

Auschwitz took a dreadful toll on him. Mentally, he was closer to the dead than to the living, and almost a year elapsed before he would go anywhere without thrusting food into his pockets. Thrown into depression, he survived by acting out his feelings through conversations with friends, acquaintances and even strangers, and then by writing.

Primo Levi

"I've worked on it for a long time, with love and rage," he wrote of If This Be A Man. "I don't know if it is mediocre, good or very good; but I believe I have managed to do something more than free myself of an obsession, and save my memories from oblivion."

Angier claims the best years of Levi's life were immediately after the war, when he married, fathered a family and worked as a chemist in a paint factory.

All the while, in the evenings, Levi wróte furiously. Angier maintains that The Periodic Table, released in Italy in 1975 and in the United States in 1984, was the turning point of his career as a novelist.

It catapulted him from a respected figure into a famous one.

Like some survivors, Levi returned to Auschwitz as a tourist, not once but twice. The first visit was harrowing, the second less so.

On the eve of his departure to Auschwitz, he signed an open letter, subscribed to by Jewish leaders and intellectuals and printed in La Repubblica, calling for the withdrawal of Israeli troops from Lebanon and the recognition of the rights of "all peoples of the region."

As a student, Levi had admired the ideals of left-wing Zionism, though he had not been a Zionist himself. After Auschwitz, he strongly supported Israel's existence, but not without doubts and reservations about its stance toward the Palestinians. In 1969, for example, he signed a petition protesting Israeli policies.

Till the end of his days, Levi struggled with depression. Writing to a friend in 1987, the year of his death, he confessed he had lost his ability to concentrate and, thus, to read or write. He spent days in a state of anxiety, waiting for the release of sleep.

In April of that year, police were summoned to his home at Corso Re Umberto 75. His lifeless body had been found at the foot of a stairwell. A police report concluded that he had committed suicide.

"The central, painful and paradoxical truth is that Primo Levi was depressed before and after Auschwitz, but not in it," Angier observes. "He thought of suicide before and after Auschwitz, but not in it.

"Depression and suicide were in him from the start. Primo Levi's death was personal. It was a tragedy, but it was not a victory for Auschwitz."

Cuban Jews say, 'Muchas gracias, Canada!'

By KEITH LANDY and SHOEL SILVER

Guest Voice

The strong bonds that tie Canadian Jewry to the Jewish community of Cuba are very much in evidence as that island's 1,500 Jews continue to preserve their identity under difficult conditions. During our recent trip to Havana, we felt the appreciation for Canadian Jewish organizations as we visited with leaders and many community members. Cuba is one of the last Diaspora communities in crisis. Canada's Jewish community was described as a "lifeline to Cuban Jewry" for its special relationship that has spanned more than 40 years.

Since 1961, following the U.S. embargo on Cuba, the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, as part of its "Moess Chittin" program, has annually shipped kosher goods for Passover, including foods and wine. The food helps to sustain the community past the celebration of Pesach and stretches throughout the year.

The arrival of the shipment and its distribution is highly anticipated and is itself a unifying event that brings the Jewish community together. That it arrives in time for a festival that celebrates freedom is at once symbolic and poignant.

It was a proud moment when Jose Miller and Adela Dworin, president and vice-president, respectively, of the Cuban Jewish Community presented us with a "Diploma of Gratitude" for the role CJC has played in sustaining the community through some of its darkest moments with those Passover shipments.

UIAFC has also made a difference in the lives of Cuban Jews striving to maintain our traditions and eager to learn and experience more Jewish activities, suppressed during 44 years of official state atheism. In 2003, UIAFC sponsored the participation of 10 Cuban youths in the Birthright Israel program, which brings Jewish youth, ages 18 to 26, from all over the world for a one-week visit to Israel.

Although Cuba's Jewish population has dwindled to just 10 per cent of its high of more than 15,000 prior to the revolution, there are currently three shuls operating in Havana, where some 1,200 Jews live (the remaining 300 are spread throughout the provinces). While there is no rabbi or mohel, there is a shochet and a kosher butcher.

The connection between Cuba's Jews and Canada goes beyond our country's Jewish community. The Canadian embassy has acted in Israel's consular interest since 1973, when Fidel Castro broke diplomatic ties with the Jewish state. Our delegation had the privilege of meeting with the Canadian ambassador to Cuba, Alexandra Bugailiskis, and her staff.

In addition to ourselves and our wives, the Canadian delegation consisted of UIAFC executive vice-president, Maxyne Finkelstein; UIAFC director of Israel and overseas programs Adam Minsky; Barry Naiberg, chair of the UIAFC Israel Experience committee; Barbara Bank, chair of the National Jewish Campus Life committee; philanthropist Paul Morton; and Lisa Ain, one of the Canadian Birthright participants from last summer, who travelled with the Cubans.

It was a rewarding and enriching experience to personally connect with the members of this resilient community. But, despite our good efforts, the stark economic reality of the Cuban economy continues to take its toll. Since the fall of the Soviet Union, the country's principal benefactor, Cuban GDP has dropped by 35 per cent.

In recent years, Jewish organizations such as the Joint Distribution Committee (financially supported by our community) have had a freer hand to operate in Cuba. As barriers to the United States slowly disintegrate, the community can now count on increased aid from American Jewry. But the unique relationship between the Canadian and Cuban Jewish communities will continue and has become an integral part of the survival of this small isolated Diaspora community.

Israel, not PA, cracking down on terror

MYTH:

Periods of quiet are the result of the Palestinian Authority's crackdown on terrorists and would continue if not for Israeli military actions.

FACT:

The fact that a major terrorist attack does not occur does not mean that violence has ceased or that the PA is preventing attacks against Israelis. The main reason for periods of relative calm is the vigilance of Israel's security forces.

In the six-week period from October to mid-November 2003, for example, no "major" terrorist attacks occurred. In that same period, however, 14 Israelis were killed by terrorists, 14 suicide bombing attempts were foiled, and the number of terror alerts increased from 30 per day to 50 per day.

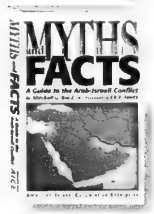
Israel must continue to take military measures to ensure its security. When the PA takes the steps it promised in accepting the road map peace plan to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure and disarm the terrorists, the threat of violence will decrease and the need for Israeli military action will be reduced.

MYTH:

The Palestinian Authority is co-operating in the investigation of a terrorist ambush this past fall that killed three Americans in Gaza.

FACT:

On Oct. 15, 2003, a powerful roadside bomb ripped apart an armoured vehicle in a U.S. diplomatic convoy travelling through the Gaza Strip, killing three Americans and wounding one. Palestinian authorities detained seven men from a rogue group that included former members of the Palestinian security forces. American officials, however, did not believe these were the perpetrators, and the FBI team probing the terrorist attack returned to the United States after expressing dismay over the lack of co-operation it received from the Palestinian security services.



U.S. officials said the PA failed to provide FBI investigators with sufficient access to the bombing site and allowed pedestrians to enter the scene of the attack and destroy evidence. The Bush administration subsequently banned visits by U.S. officials to the Gaza Strip because of the lack of co-operation with the investigation.

After three months of obstruction, U.S. officials informed the PA in December 2003 that special road map envoy John Wolf would not return to the region until progress was made in the investigation. U.S. Assistant Secretary of State William Burns and other officials also delivered a series of sharp messages to PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia and other Palestinian officials over the lack of progress in the probe.

MYTH:

The media treat terrorist attacks against Israel the same way as they do attacks on other nations.

FACT:

Terrorist attacks against Israeli citizens are often treated by the media in an entirely different way than similar atrocities committed against members of other nationalities. Many press outlets are reluctant to call attacks against Jews terrorism and frequently attach more benign labels to the murderers such as "gunmen" or "militants." For example, when a Palestinian woman walked into a crowded beach restaurant in Haifa and detonated a bomb that killed 21 people, including four children on Oct. 4, 2003, a Reuters account said she had waged an "attack" in retaliation for previous Israeli army actions and that the bombing showed that Palestinian officials had failed to "rein in the militants."

One of the best examples of how the press sometimes distinguishes terror attacks on Israel from attacks on other nations could be seen in a list of "recent terror attacks around the world" disseminated in November 2003 by the Associated Press. The list cited 15 terrorist incidents during the five-year period between August 1998 and August 2003. During that period, more than 800 Israelis were murdered in terrorist attacks, but not one of those incidents made the list.

Similarly, when AP released its Year in Photos 2003, six of the 130 photos chosen related to human suffering in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. All six were of Palestinians.

Ode to joy

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Jewish people have been told for the longest time that when the month of Adar begins, we increase our joy. The Talmud states, in various ways, that the month of Adar is our month of joy, a time when we are predisposed to good things and joyful responses. It is part of the "topsy turvy" aspect of Purim, the holiday that falls in the month of Adar.

Haman, the villain of Purim, set out to destroy the Jewish people and drew lots to designate the month most unlucky for the Jews. The midrash states that Haman was able to align a biblical figure with each month of the year, but was unable to find any to fit the month of Adar. He was clearly unaware of Moses' birth in Adar. Haman decreed that the month of Adar would be the month in which the Jewish people would disappear from history. As with most things in the book of Esther, this aspect of the story was turned into its opposite and Adar is now the month of Jewish joy.

In the last few years, it's been easy to forget about Jewish joy. Not the personal joy that one experiences at a celebration of a lifecycle event. Rather the national joy that is part of the Jewish identity and essence. With global politics as complex as they now are, we are inundated with accusations that reach us from the far corners of the globe. Apparently the Jewish people are responsible for everything from economic conspiracy to global warming. And I certainly want to mention my personal favourite which cast Barbie into our midst as a seemingly Jewish toy second only to the dreidel.

It is no wonder that we feel estranged from the concept of national joy. And yet our texts are filled with how central joy must be to our Jewish experiences – not just the ritual experiences, not just the relationship with God, but central to our everyday encounters with each other.

A midrashic text mentions a great rabbi who encountered the prophet Elijah in a marketplace and asked Elijah to identify for him who from the marketplace would merit the world-to-come. Elijah identified the jesters, because they bring joy and peace to their fellow human beings.

The Talmud states that a man is obligated to cause his wife, his children and the members of his household to rejoice. In other words, coming home and greeting everyone with a comment that makes them happy is not just a kind action, it is a commanded action.

The Zohar likewise discusses the centrality of joy within Jewish experience and explicitly describes how joy can maintain a spiritual tie between us and realms we never imagined. According to the Zohar, if a person whose parents are no longer living invites God to share in his or her hour of joy, God invites the person's parents to share in that hour of joy together with God, for they are partners with God in their child.

It is easy to tell ourselves that there is not very much to be joyful about these days. But Jewish law never predicated itself on convenient opportunities. I do not wait for an opportunity to perform a commandment to arrive at my doorstep; I must actively pursue that opportunity. If I cannot find something to be joyful about, then clearly I am not searching hard enough.

Adar is beginning and it is our most joyful month. We should remember the midrash stating that two sectarians were arguing over who was the greater person. One was named Simcha (joy) and the other was named Sasson (happiness). This Adar we have 29 days to find ways to have joy argue with happiness. Those are the kinds of arguments we can celebrate.

Understanding Gaza

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon created headlines when he revealed his intention to unilaterally remove Jewish settlers from Gaza. As he crystallizes his plan, the world will continue to be focused on the small sliver of land at the southeast corner of the Mediterranean. Today, tracking Gaza.

Sharon broke the news about Gaza in an interview with Yoel Marcus, a writer with the Israeli daily Ha'aretz. The interview touched on many issues, including the road map peace plan and corruption investigations swirling around Sharon's family. But it was the prime minister's comments about Gaza that made the headlines. "I've given orders to prepare for evacuating – excuse me, relocating – 17 settlements in Gaza with a total of 7,500 inhabitants." You can read an English translation of the entire interview in full at the Ha'aretz website [www.haaretz.com/hasen/spages/391366.html].

How did we get to this point? You can learn more about the history of Gaza from several online sources such as Shaul Cohen's entry in Encarta [http://encarta.msn.com/encyclopedia_761579828/Gaza_Strip.html]. For more on the recent history of the area, see the Wikipedia's History of the West Bank and Gaza Strip [http://makeashorterlink.com/?O1DC23757].

The CIA has created factbooks about practically every country and significant region of the world. In the entry on the Gaza Strip, you'll find statistics about the area's population (1.27 million, approximately 50 per cent under the age of 15, plus more than 5,000 Israeli settlers) and its unemployment rate (50 per cent) [www.cia.gov/cia/publications/factbook/geos/gz.html].

One of the major political events to take place in the region was the "Agreement on the Gaza Strip and the Jericho Area" that was signed by Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization in May 1994. The agreement provided for the transfer of certain powers and responsibilities to the Palestinian Authority. Although some of it has come into effect, much of it has been stalled and at times reversed due to violence in the region. You can read the entire agreement online. Look for links to other relevant documents and maps at the bottom of the page [www.us-israel.org/jsource/Peace/gazajer.html].

What is life like in Gaza? In 2001, the New York Times' Chris Hedges wrote a feature article for Harper's titled "A Gaza Diary: Scenes from the Palestinian Uprising." Hedges spent seven days in the Khan Younis refugee camp in the Gaza Strip and described cruelty inflicted by Israeli soldiers upon Gazans and the despair that drives them toward militant Islam [http://makeashorterlink.com/?O49D22757]. Amnesty International awarded the article its Global Award for Human Rights Journalism [www.amnesty.org.uk/deliver/document/12633]. HonestReporting called the Hedges article "one of the most anti-Israel reports by a mainstream American writer in recent years" and published rebuttals on its website [http://makeashorterlink.com/?A2ED26757].

Just after Sharon's announcement on the settlements, Bradley Burston of Ha'aretz met with Jewish settlers in Gaza to get their reaction. Yigal Kirzenschaft, a resident of Neve Dekalim, the largest Jewish community in Gaza, spoke about the tiny settlement of Kfar Yam. "The proper step is to bring another 100 families there, and then there will be no problem. That is the true Zionism – settling the land, and not surrendering to the Arabs" [http://makeashorterlink.com/?W24B12A57].

Larry Derfner writes in the Jerusalem Post that a unilateral withdrawal from Gaza should not be looked upon as a defeat for Israel. He points to Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon, which is often credited as giving Palestinians incentive to start the intifadah. He argues that an intifadah would probably have started sooner or later, and that on the whole, unilaterally quitting Lebanon – and Gaza – are the right things to do [http://makeashorterlink.com/?J6C051857].

The Gaza story will not end anytime soon. I suggest keeping up on the latest developments in English through the pages of Ha'aretz [www.haaretz.com], the Jerusalem Post [www.jpost.com] and Kol Yisrael's daily broadcasts [www.israelradio.org/english.html].

'Major problem' in inner circle of Rabbi Soloveitchik

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

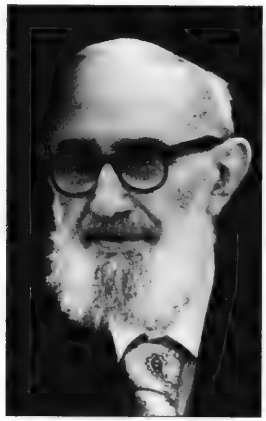
There are so many people who speak in the name of the late Rabbi Joseph Dov Soloveitchik that historical revisionism has become a major problem, says Rabbi Aaron Adler.

Speaking at Netivot HaTorah Day School, Rabbi Adler, who was ordained by Rabbi Soloveitchik at Yeshiva University in 1977 and served as his special assistant from 1974 to 1976, said controversial areas include Rabbi Soloveitchik's stand on secular studies, religious Zionism and women's issues.

The lecture, titled "The Rav's Approach to Selected Modern Orthodox Issues: A View from the Inside," was co-sponsored by the Netivot Parents' Association and Mizrachi Association, in conjunction with the school's program honouring Rabbi Soloveitchik's 10th yahrzeit.

Even within Rabbi Soloveitchik's "inner circle," there are people who have tried to bring him "into the fold of the yeshivishe [haredi] world," said Rabbi Adler, a native New Yorker who made aliyah in 1979. He noted a series of books that omitted any mention of Yeshiva University (a modern Orthodox institution) when citing Rabbi Soloveitchik, so that the books would have "a chance to make it in Lakewood [a haredi enclave in New Jersey known for its eponymous yeshiva]."

The Rav, as Rabbi Soloveitchik was affectionately referred to, identified with and was totally committed to Yeshiva University's motto, "Torah u'Madah" (Torah and science), said Rabbi Adler, who has a PhD in Talmud from Bar-Ilan University and is rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Bnei Akiva Ner Tamid in Hashmona'im. The institution was founded in Rabbi Soloveitchik's memory.



Rabbi Joseph Dov Soloveitchik

Rabbi Adler recalls his mentor as "a personality who comes around once in a millenium," a sensitive individual, a prolific writer and an "unbelievable speaker" who could expound before rapt audiences for three to four hours in English, Hebrew and Yiddish.

A native of Lithuania, Rabbi Soloveitchik studied at the University of Berlin before immigrating to Boston in 1932. Whatever his reasons for studying at a secular university – it has been said that avoiding the Polish army draft was a significant factor – "it's not important what he thought before," said Rabbi Adler, citing Rabbi Soloveitchik's son-in-law, Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein. "What's important is what he thought about secular education after he came out of the University of Berlin."

Rabbi Soloveitchik was "a staunch advocate for general education, and that has to be said loud and clear," said Rabbi Adler.

His stance on religious Zionism has also been analyzed and questioned, in part because of reservations he expressed in 1956 over the inclusion of Hallel (a compilation of six psalms praising God) on Yom Ha'Atzmaut.

In fact, said Rabbi Adler, Rabbi Soloveitchik paid a bitter price for his involvement with both secular education and Zionism. "He was ostracized by [part of] his family, and yet [he] never held it against them."

As one example of Rabbi Soloveitchik's pro-Zionist feelings, Rabbi Adler noted that when his mentor won a large cash prize in a Jerusalem literary competition for a book of his Yom Kippur teachings, he did not think twice about donating his prize money to chesder yeshivot, which combine Torah study with Israeli army service.

Regarding women's issues, Rabbi Adler said Rabbi Soloveitchik "clearly believed that anyone who assumes the Torah holds women as second-class citizens is extremely out of order." Rabbi Soloveitchik was a "champion of women's rights" in Jewish education and believed that all areas of intellectual activity were open to women, said Rabbi Adler.

The Rav had no objection to the celebration of bat mitzvahs, Rabbi Adler noted, but felt they should be celebrated in a hall or at home rather than in a synagogue. "This was clearly a stand against Conservative and Reform [Judaism]."

On the other hand, Rabbi Soloveitchik "broke rank with the Agudah world" in the 1950s when he joined the Synagogue Council of America, an umbrella at the time for the different streams of Judaism. However, Rabbi Adler added, Rabbi Soloveitchik restricted his interdenominational cooperation to issues of "klal Yisrael," such as a blood drive to help Israel during the Yom Kippur War.

When it came to "internal Jewish subject matters," such as the use of microphones at Shabbat services, he felt there was no partner, said Rabbi Adler.

Rabbi Soloveitchik's stand on the non-Orthodox streams of Judaism can be inferred by his psak (rabbinic ruling) to someone who asked him about standing outside a nearby Conservative synagogue instead of travelling to a more distant Orthodox congregation to hear the shofar on Rosh Hashanah. "The Rav said, 'Stay home. Don't acknowledge the fact this is a beit knesset.'

"It may sound harsh," said Rabbi Adler, "but you have to realize the Rav was fighting a battle for the sincerity and pureness of what the Torah is all about."

Reflecting on his personal connection with Rabbi Soloveitchik, Rabbi Adler said it was a "tremendous z'chut [privilege] to have become acquainted with a bona fide modern godol [great Torah sage] who made Yiddishkeit relevant and meaningful to myself, my friends and colleagues, and to all of klal Yisrael."

Immersion teaches love of Judaism, scholar says

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to the CJN

Through an identity-building strategy that involves immersion, rituals and rules, parents and the Jewish community as a whole can teach children to love being Jewish, says a leading scholar and rabbi.

"When it comes to Jewish education and parenting, we kind of hope for the best," said Rabbi Daniel Gordis, speaking recently at the Rabbi Stuart and Hadassa Rosenberg annual memorial lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"I suggest… we can improve [that approach] if we use some strategic thinking."

Rabbi Gordis' talk, titled "Teaching Your Kids to Love Being Jewish," outlined a strategy that begins with immersion.

"Everywhere the child turns, there [should be] something Jewish about this and that," Rabbi Gordis said, giving the example of something as simple as children learning early on to use a dairy spoon to eat chocolate pudding.

"Even that mere act… says to our children a tremendous amount about who and what they are."

Rabbi Gordis, vice-president of the Mandel Foundation in Israel and director of its Jerusalem fellows program, said immersion doesn't have to be confined to the home, as sending children to a Jewish camp or school also immerses them in their culture and faith.

The power of rituals, from weddings to reciting blessings, is also a major component to Jewish identity-building, he said.

"Jewish rituals have the capacity to let us feel things we can't usually feel," he said. "They create those powerful Jewish moments we want [our children] to have."

Rabbi Gordis spoke of how the rituals in a Shabbat dinner can strike an emotional chord with children that stays with them throughout life.

He was adamant about the crucial role of rules in fostering a connection to Judaism, despite many people's aversion to them.

"Rules must be non-negotiable," Rabbi Gordis' said. "Our kids will stick with what they think is serious."

He said that by not having well-established rules, children will grow up to push the envelope, giving the example of someone who wasn't raised in an observant home choosing to marry a non-Jew.

"The presence of rules communicates to kids… that it's not just about me, it's about something bigger."

He holds a PhD from the University of Southern California and has written several books on Jewish life, including Becoming a Jewish Parent. He has also written about the collapse of the Oslo peace process for the New York Times and the New York Times Magazine.

Seder celebrates Tu b'Shvat

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Torat HaTeva, a Jewish nature organization in Toronto, hosted its third annual Tu b'Shvat seder for young adults last weekend to celebrate the Jewish new year of the trees.

The 30 people in attendance danced to the throbbing beats of drums, sang folk songs, made up skits and snacked on nuts and fruit to commemorate the holiday.

The concept of a Tu b'Shvat seder is an ancient kabbalistic tradition that originated in the city of Safed in the 15th century. In recent years, there has been a revival of the Tu b'Shvat seder, due in part to renewed interest by Jewish youth in both Kabbalah and ecology, said Rabbi Tzvi Freeman, one of the event's five organizers.

The Torat HaTeva seder was based on the kabbalistic notion of four levels of the spiritual world. Participants were urged to create skits based on each of the four levels: action, formation, creation and emanation.

Since every spiritual world has a corresponding fruit, fruits and nuts were handed out and comparisons were made. Rabbi Freeman used a pistachio as a metaphor for the world we live in, the lowest one on the kabbalistic scale.

"You look past the shell, peel it away and the inside is beautiful," he said.

Fruits with pits, such as the olive, correspond to the second spiritual level. Wholly edible fruits such as dried apricot and apple represent the third spiritual level. The fourth spiritual level, being the highest, has no earthly correspondence.

The holiday took root in Israel and the customs spread among Sephardi Jews in Europe, the Middle East and North Africa. The outline for a Tu b'Shvat seder is found in a kabbalistic text called Pri Etz Hadar. Alexandra Kuperman, another of the event's organizers, said the event was an attempt to emphasize the spiritual side of nature.

"The seder allows people to look at things like the creation story and understand it," she said. "It was our most successful seder. It was quite free-flowing and incorporated a lot of exploration."

Torat HaTeva gives educational seminars to students of all ages on Judaism and the environment and its members receive weekly e-mails on these issues. The group is currently planning its next community project, planting a Jewish community garden. For more information or to get involved, call 416-992-9972 or visit www.torathateva.org.

Welcoming immigrants family to family

By WENDY LAMPERT
UJA Federation

Imagine the overwhelming feeling of beginning a new life in a new land. You've sold everything you own, packed up your belongings and said goodbye to everyone you love. You then enter a new world full of questions, surprises and even loneliness.

That's what more than 600 Jewish immigrant families experience each year as they arrive in Toronto from around the world. And that's why UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy has partnered with JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Service) Toronto, Jewish Information Service and JVS Toronto to create the Family to Family Matching Program.

The program will match new immigrant families with established families in Toronto's Jewish community in an effort to ease their transition to life in Canada. At the first information meeting last week, 25 community members considering participation in the program heard from three recent immigrants about their experiences.

"We have so many immediate needs, and no one there to guide us. We don't know the rules," said Monica Zalcman, who arrived with her family 18 months ago. "Toronto has a great Jewish community, and we want to be a part of it. This program will make Toronto a more welcoming city," she noted.

"During regular life, you solve problems one by one. When you immigrate, it's a shock, and everything happens at once," said Ludmila Olshansky, a Russian hydro geologist who immigrated to Toronto with her family from Israel a year ago.

"There are so many things you need to ask," said Lia Waldman, who arrived from Mexico City with her family six months ago. "Where do I find a doctor? What kind of winter coats should I buy for my children? It makes such a difference to have someone to talk to."

Among the interested Toronto participants was Juana Sleizer, who came to Toronto from Argentina with her family seven years ago. Now a Canadian citizen, Sleizer said she is still learning the ropes, but believes her family has much to offer. "We want to help newcomers so they don't have to go through what we went through, so they don't feel so alone," she said.

"Integration is a very hard thing, and this program will speed up the process," said Andrea Cohen, Chair of the advocacy arm of Women's Campaign & Advocacy, along with Lisa Draper. "We take for granted the basic networking opportunities we have here," added Draper. "This will really help them."

The Family to Family pilot program hopes to begin with 25 families. Training will take place March 10, and families will be matched before Passover.

New Challenges. New Approaches

By LESLIE GALES
Chair, UJA Federation

In Israel, the number of challenges facing the country is only exceeded by the number of opinions about how to solve them. The disparity between rich and poor is, unfortunately increasing. Social service funds are scarce. The cost of absorbing immigrants who are critical for Israel's strength is high and security is a constant concern. Yet, despite these difficulties, or perhaps because of them, many groundbreaking initiatives are underway. On behalf of UJA Federation, David Engel, our Vice-Chair, and I are proud to be involved with them.

- About 1,000 new non-profit organizations (NGOs) are registered in Israel each year, reflecting a trend toward partnerships between the Israeli government, non-profits and private enterprise to deal with difficult issues. The Sacta Rashi Foundation - one of Israel's largest NGOs - with which UJA Federation is developing an association - is the catalyst for many partnership projects, worth approximately $100 million.
- The Jewish Learning Institute, supported by UJA Federation's overseas partner, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), is currently preparing 2,200 students for conversion. The institute's faculty of 150 teachers across the country represent all streams of Judaism, but the conversions take place under Orthodox auspices. One of the institute's most pioneering programs is helping non-Jewish Israeli soldiers to convert.
- A new JAFI project is adding a warmer, more human dimension to the tough process of immigrant absorption. The Home and Together program is matching new immigrants with former immigrant families who are mentoring them. So far, the Jewish Agency has arranged nearly 1,000 matches. And, in Toronto, by the way, we're in the midst of developing a similar initiative.

Leslie Gales

Home and Together reminds us that our work is primarily about helping people and improving their lives. Recently, several young adults from Toronto wrote letters to comfort families who lost loved ones in terror attacks. This response says it all about our hopes and dreams:

I have received your warm letter. I feel your support for my loss-the death of my husband. My children and I appreciate your caring and kindness towards us and the State of Israel. I pray for peace and quiet in our country and an end to the terror.

Thank you
Ben-Aroya family.

Waldman looks forward to new challenge

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

For Mark Waldman, a man who dedicates his time as a volunteer to both Israel and Toronto's Jewish community, the path to volunteerism and Israeli advocacy was paved at home. The Waldman family - headed by Mark's parents Lionel and Sandy - has always understood the importance of tzedaka.

Mark, a longtime volunteer with UJA Federation, was recently named as Co-Chair - along with David Goldstein - of CIJA-PAC, a division of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), Canada's new Israel advocacy organization. CIJA-PAC is a membership organization that will enlist thousands of Canadians in crucial advocacy efforts on behalf of Israel.

In addition to this latest project, Mark continues his ongoing role as Co-Chair of UJA Federation's Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund and its Major Gifts Campaign. He also sits on the board of the Fairness project, serves as Co-Chair of the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre Campaign, and volunteers for the United Way.

In 2002, Mark worked full time at Access Middle East (AME) in the United States, a program that supplies fair and balanced information about the Middle East to journalists around the world.

"Mark has a special talent, an ability to connect his remarkable global network with the policy agenda of the Jewish community," says Hershell Ezrin, the CEO of CIJA. "Few people can pull it off his way in such a quiet, unassuming and totally effective manner."

"I was honoured to be asked by Hershell to come aboard, and given my passion and concerns for what is going on around the world, I jumped at the chance," says Waldman. "Through my work with Access Middle East, I have met with many Jewish leaders, Israeli government officials, politicians and philanthropists which has helped me develop a great network. I am now able to employ that network to help build CIJA-PAC."

Waldman says concerned members of Canadian Jewry must realize that simply "talking the talk" won't suffice any more; it's time to get involved.

"Our goal with CIJA-PAC is to get Canadian Jews involved in the process," says Waldman. "We are all concerned about events unfolding around us. However, very few people actually take the time to get involved. If we want to ensure a bright future for the next generation, we all need to make some sacrifices now. At the very least, we all need to join a political party now, because as Jews, we need strong representation in all parties."

A granddaughter's trek to her zaidy's past

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Growing up, Nadine Zuckier, 22, remembers listening to her zaidy Sam's horrific accounts of his experiences as an Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp inmate. Now, those stories have taken on even deeper significance after her recent trip to Israel and Poland as a participant on the Anguish to Hope program, funded by Canadian Jewish Federations, through UIA Federations Canada. There she visited the camp in which Sam, 83, was held prisoner.

But no matter how many times Nadine heard the stories, researched the Holocaust, or watched the movies, she still wasn't prepared for the grim reality that is Birkenau.

"It was extremely difficult to be at Birkenau," she says. "I could actually picture him there. I even knew that he was in barracks number 10. It all became far too real when I walked through there, imagining what it was like for my zaidy and bubby (who died when Nadine was just four), and all the others who suffered at the hands of the Nazis. Even though I thought I knew everything there was to know, being there really hit home."

In fact, while Nadine wanted to call her zaidy after her first day in Poland, she found the experience far too upsetting to put into words.

"Absolutely," she says. "I wanted to call him right away to say, 'zaidy, I'm here at Birkenau, the place you've told me about all these years,' but I couldn't. I had to wait until I got to Israel to finally call him."

Of all the lessons her zaidy taught her since she was a little girl, one resonates with Nadine the most - the will to live.

"So many people watched their friends and families being murdered; I can't even begin to imagine what that must have been like. To me, my zaidy and bubby Eva, and other Holocaust survivors are the bravest people in the world. My zaidy always taught me that we, as Jews, must never give up."

"That's right," adds Sam, nodding in agreement with his granddaughter's assertion. "I was lucky to survive, but all the time I was in Birkenau, I thought to myself, 'I will never give up.' I thought 'if they kill me, then they kill me, but it won't be because I ever gave up.' You learn quickly that you must have a will to fight the enemy because the best revenge of all is going on to have a full life and a beautiful family, just like I have."

Although Nadine's account of her trip brought back some terrible memories for Sam, he says that experiences such as Anguish to Hope should be a part of all young Jewish lives.

"I was so happy that she went on this trip to see all these things that I lived so many years ago," says Sam. "Programs like Anguish to Hope are a blessing because they take these kids to Israel and to Poland where so much of their lives – and our lives as Jews – are forever connected."

Clothing drive suits JASS just fine

Thanks to a clothing drive initiated by UJA Federation's Fashion Division, clients of the Just a Second Shop (JASS), operated by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), and located on Bathurst Street and York Downs, now have an unprecedented selection of quality goods to choose from.

The drive, chaired by Lorie Goldfinger and Ron Prosserman, and undertaken in collaboration with UJA Federation's Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund (JVPF), began last fall.

JASS provides a number of benefits to the Jewish community and those who are served by JF&CS and Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) - partner agencies of UJA Federation. All JASS net proceeds are used to send underprivileged Jewish children to summer camps. In addition, many agency clients who require financial assistance become eligible to be part of the store's voucher program, which in turn, allows them to shop for free.

The UJA Fashion Division is recruiting members of the clothing industry, including wholesalers, manufacturers, and retailers, to donate some of the latest clothing styles to the store to help raise profits and the spirits of its clientele.

"Through this clothing drive, the Fashion Division is already making a huge difference in the lives of so many of Toronto's underprivileged citizens," says Prosserman. "These contributions of new and popular clothing labels will help to give clients of our agencies the dignity they deserve."

"For example, we recently had a generous donation of winter coats," says Prosserman, "and thanks to that, the shop sold over $2,000 in one day compared to just $500 on the same date one year ago."

A past Chair of the Fashion Division, Goldfinger is excited about this project and hopes it's just the beginning.

"For those of us in the clothing business, this is the perfect project to be involved in," says Goldfinger. "Clothes are what we know best, and this is how we can help," he says. "Recently Roy Perlman of The Jean Machine donated 1,000 pairs of brand name jeans to the store. Now, when clients walk in, they have a real selection to choose from. This not only makes them happy, but it means more sales, it improves the profit margin, and, more kids go to summer camp."

The JASS clothing drive is one of many projects undertaken by the Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund – which identifies and then invests in community programs.

Planning for tomorrow

UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative is planning a redevelopment project for the central area of Toronto's Jewish community in the Bathurst & Sheppard district. The central campus redevelopment program involves eight centres of excellence covering all facets of Jewish life. One of them is the Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Learning. Stakeholders and planning committee members for this centre recently took part in a workshop to develop a creative vision for the future centre. They were joined by representatives of various Toronto arts, cultural and community institutions to explore ideas about how the centre could best serve our community in the new century. Internationally renowned consultant Gail Dexter Lord, who facilitated the discussions, also provided insight into how blurring boundaries between centres of culture, history and heritage can influence the design and impact of new institutions. Participants included (l-r) Dan Rahimi of the Royal Ontario Museum, Lori Martin of the Culture Division for the City of Toronto, Liz Wolfe, Chair of The Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Learning, Pam Medjuck, committee member and Brian Arnott, Novita Theatre Consultants .

Eradicate poverty: time for action

By GORDON WOLFE

Few subjects have produced so much sincere talk – and so little action – as poverty within the Jewish community. Just over two years ago, The CJN hosted a roundtable discussion that asked why there still is poverty in our community. Since then, there have been numerous articles written, conferences held and resolutions passed on the subject. The issue was addressed, yet again, last December at a Hope for Tomorrow Symposium hosted by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Who are these people who are living in poverty? The vast majority of them are clients of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS). They can't work because they have become sick or disabled, or their marriage failed, or they fled an abusive spouse and they are raising young children on their own, or they don't qualify for employment insurance, or the insurance has run out and they can't find another job.

Jewish Family and Child Service

Rob is a single father with three children. He became involved with JF&CS because of child-protection concerns. The children's mother, who has a drug addiction, has been in and out of the picture for years. Rob has been the consistent parent despite his arthritis and a recent stroke.

Henry is a 58-year-old man who suffers from severe depression. His life has been devastated by illness and he is on a disability pension. Estranged from his two children and separated from his wife, Henry was found by a JF&CS social worker after having collapsed in his home.

Nadia and her husband, along with their three children, arrived from Russia 2½ years ago. Both parents work part time, but only because they have been unable to find full-time work. While they earn too much to qualify for social assistance, they are nonetheless unable to manage on their meagre earnings.

All of these individuals spoke about the assistance they had received from JF&CS – financial help, food vouchers, camp subsidies, Chanukah gifts for their children, clothing from the Just-A-Second Shop and counselling and support from staff social workers.

But despite the help, they said they felt excluded from the Jewish community, and spoke about their difficulties accessing some services and navigating the social-service system, as well as serious problems finding employment and subsidized housing and not having funds for their children to participate in social, recreational and cultural activities.

The level of poverty in Toronto is worse today than it was two years ago. More than 20,000 Jews live below or near the poverty line and more than 3,000 of these are children. Since The CJN roundtable discussion, the financial assistance caseload at JF&CS has increased by 20 per cent. The organization now receives twice as many requests to assist with rent arrears to avoid eviction, and more requests to assist with payment of gas or hydro so it won't be cut off.

Despite daily evidence to the contrary, there is still a widespread myth among Jews that there is no poverty in our community. This is probably due to the high level of success most Toronto Jews have reached in education and income, along with the community's broad network of well- known and respected institutions. But emphasizing these aspects of the Toronto Jewish experience may inadvertently contribute to the lack of awareness of poverty.

And what about the children? Child poverty is a tragedy. There is abundant statistical evidence that family income has a major effect on children's well-being. The data, taken from two national surveys – the National Longitudinal Survey of Children and Youth and the National Population Health Survey – show that as family income rises, children's chances of developing to their full potential increase steadily. Together, these surveys track more than 20,000 children and families over time in order to better understand the factors that influence their health and well-being. Thirty-one different indicators of good health and well-being used in these surveys show that as family income falls, the likelihood that children will experience problems rises. Rates of poor health, hyperactivity and delayed vocabulary development are much higher among children in low-income families than among children in middle- and high-income families. A child's likelihood of participating in organized sports activities is dramatically lower if they live in poor families, while rates of positive social relations and activities increase with income. More than 16 per cent of older teens in poor families do not attend school, nor do they have a job compared to less than four per cent of teens in high-income families.

Gordon Wolfe

The Hope for Tomorrow symposium was never intended to solve the problem of poverty in our community. That solution will require governments to take the lead. Instead, its purpose was to create new ways to improve the lives of Toronto's Jewish poor. Three initiatives emerged: to work on assisting people to access affordable housing; to identify specific vulnerable populations that could be supported by volunteers; and to convene a community council that would address accessibility of services and educate the broader Jewish community about poverty. These are good ideas and we will need to ensure they are implemented.

But much more needs to be done. It is immoral that we live in a community in which there are haves and have-nots. The rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer. We have created an entrenched underclass. In Jewish tradition, the widow, orphan and stranger must enjoy the same rights to food, clothing and shelter as the privileged class. It is the obligation of every Jew to perform acts of tzedakah, not out of a monetary whim or a sudden philanthropic impulse, but in fulfilment of a religious obligation.

In the book of Exodus, God tells us that the cries of the poor are heard, and "I will pay heed, for I am compassionate." As we are made in God's image, so too we must have compassion – for the children, the elderly and the immigrants. Our community has a responsibility to take action.

People of the educational books...

Malcolm Lester new director of Lola Stein Institute

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

In 1964, Malcolm Lester left graduate studies at Hebrew Union College and a future as a man of religion in favour of becoming, quite literally, a man of the book.

Since then, Lester's career has included almost every aspect of work in the publishing industry, from managing editor at Holt, Rinehart & Winston to publisher of Malcolm Lester Books. His credits include educational books and works related to Jewish subjects, including None is Too Many by Irving Abella and Harold Troper, which was released by Lester & Orpen Dennys in 1983, while he was the company's president.

As the new publishing director of the Lola Stein Institute for Shared Learning at the Toronto Heschel School, Lester plans to combine his lifelong interest in Jewish subjects with his publishing experience to produce books for students and teachers.

The institute, which was founded last December through a major donation, will run like a regular publishing house, Lester said. However, where the texts have been developed as part of the teachers' class work, the copyrights will belong to the Toronto Heschel School.

Initially, Lester plans to publish books developed by people who teach at or are affiliated with the school. He is hoping to eventually open the program to people who do not necessarily teach there, but who have interesting manuscripts that reflect the school's "multi-sensory, integrative, arts-based approach to learning."

By September 2004, the institute will launch a middle-school history text called Civilizations, written by Gail Baker and Baruch Rand, two of the school's founders.

"The books are in the final stages of review, editing and design and will be released in hardcover," Lester said.

"The three-part series begins with the words 'In the beginning,' and ends in the 20th century. What is innovative is that they integrate Jewish and world history together."

Other projects include a children's picture book by the Heschel school's teachers called Where is The Afikoman? and the script and CD of Ken Rebow's musical Purim play titled A Simple Twist of Fate.

"Kids in other schools will be able to take the CDs home and learn the music," he said.

Lester, who said he hopes to eventually sell translation rights to South American schools for the institute's list, believes the books will appeal to a broad Jewish market because of their ecumenical nature.

"They are not specifically geared to any one branch of Judaism," he said.

The book that most influenced his thinking, he said, was Rabbi Abraham Heschel's God In Search of Man, which he read during his Hebrew Union College years.

"I felt a congruency between his religious view and my sense about existence," he said.

Since then, Lester has made various connections with philosophical groups. He is one of the founders of the Toronto Spinoza Society, which meets once a week for three hours.

Lester, who has been the president of the Association of Canadian Publishers and taught Introduction to Book Publishing at Ryerson University, began his work in educational publishing as a math editor for Holt, Rinehart & Winston, where he later became managing editor. In 1971, he moved to Coles Publishing, the producer of Coles Notes study guides used by even the best high school students.

"I am proud to say that I was responsible for the Coles Notes version of The Lord of the Rings," he said.

Associated teacher launches French program

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Some people know her as Mrs. Vandertamp, the woman who puts on fancy hats and long evening gloves to teach students how to conjugate some French verbs.

For those who don't remember their French studies, the first letters of Mrs. Vandertamp stand for the verbs that are conjugated with être in the passé composé. Kaplan uses costumes and drama to help students memorize facts that often seem impossible to retain. Easy, n'est-ce pas?

"Even boring grammar can be taught effectively through costume, dance and drama," Kaplan said.

Four years ago, the energetic teacher who heads Associated Hebrew Day School's French department, created and launched a French program called Visa pour la langue française, currently being used by grades 6, 7 and 8 in Jewish and public schools throughout Ontario.

"Most French programs expect that students will simply learn through osmosis and that somehow they will breathe in the language," Kaplan said.

However, she found that textbooks that rely on colour and pretty pictures don't really help students in their quest for success.

Kaplan's curriculum is built on a structured, mathematical approach to learning in which a lot of practice exercises are used for reinforcement. It includes CDs with the oral components, graphic organizers for the grammar, and recommended Internet sites.

Co-authored by York University professor Savitsa Sévigny and Bialik Hebrew Day School's senior division co-ordinator Beverly Young, the French program took four years to write and uses a holistic approach to teaching a new language.

"It combines a balance of reading, writing and oral skills," Kaplan said.

In addition, the units draw on issues relevant to students and introduces cultural figures for them to relate to. There are passages on drugs and smoking, Céline Dion, the Backstreet Boys, the Group of Seven and Pablo Picasso.

"The books deal with anorexia, hypertension, anemia and depression," Kaplan said.

Recently, Kaplan launched a Grade 9 applied French program called "Express" in collaboration with Sara Garnick, the curriculum consultant at the York Region District School Board. "Express" was initially piloted at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and the York Region School Board.

"As of this year, one million students across Canada will be learning through the 'Express' program," Kaplan said.

While the program was initially intended for the applied curriculum, Kaplan said many teachers have been using it in the academic streams.

Ruby Kaplan

Next year, Kaplan will launch a Grade 10 French program that will be used in the academic stream across Canada. Eventually, she hopes to provide a complete French curriculum for the entire four years of high school.

Kaplan was born in the Belgian Congo, grew up in South Africa and moved to Nova Scotia before coming to Toronto 15 years ago. The Belgian-educated mother of three draws on her experiences at home and in the classroom to develop programs she feels will be relevant and effective. She also draws on her personal background.

"Jewish and Canadian culture are integrated into the curriculum wherever possible," Kaplan said.

For example, there is a unit on the genocides of the 20th century that describes the Rwandan tragedy, the Armenian massacre, the killing fields of the Khmer Rouge and the Holocaust.

"A poem called Terezin is included in the unit and the students discuss the implications of the concentration camp," Kaplan said.

McMaster student union monitors Zionist club

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Leaders of the McMaster University student group Zionists at McMaster are unhappy that it will continue to be monitored by the student union because of an anti-Palestinian e-mail the group distributed.

In November, as a result of the incident, Zionists at McMaster had its one-year probation as a new club extended. As well, Saeed Ally, executive adviser to the Muslim Students' Association (MSA), was appointed a governor of the Jewish group to monitor its activities and advise members how to run the club.

Ally was appointed because he is the the McMaster Student Union's (MSU) religious clubs chair, an elected position. He is not affiliated with the more political Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), said Cale Zavitz, who imposed the sanctions in his capacity as MSU clubs administrator.

The e-mail in question originated from an Iranian student and had not been thoroughly reviewed, said Judy Schwartz, director of the Hamilton campus' Jewish Students Association. As well, Zionists at McMaster subsequently apologized, said Avi Ben-Zvi, the director of the club, which was launched last September.

A Jan. 27 appeal to the MSU clubs executive committee shortened the probation so that it would end Apr. 31, but Ben-Zvi said he was shocked that his group was not completely exonerated. He thought the committee, consisting of representatives of five campus clubs, "would realize they made a mistake."

Zionists at McMaster is not affiliated with Hillel, but the two groups have been involved in joint programming. Zionists at McMaster, which has about 145 members on its listserve is a pro-Israel, pro-peace group, said Ben-Zvi.

By definition, all new clubs are on probation for one year, Zavitz said. Probation means they have "a lot more supervision" and they also receive less funding than established clubs, he added.

An extended probation means that "any infraction would result in extremely serious consequences," he added.

Last week, Ben-Zvi said his group was "unwilling to give up [its] free speech." A Zionists at McMaster delegation met with university president Peter George in December, but there has been no further contact, Ben-Zvi said.

> 'Unwilling to give up [its] free speech'

He was not sure whether the group could appeal the most recent decision, but according to Zavitz, the clubs executive council, to which they originally appealed, is the highest appeal body for clubs.

Ally's specific duties include advising the club and making sure he is informed about its day-to-day operations, said Zavitz. He is required to interfere "only if a violation of the rules arises, or if the Zionists solicit his input... How [Ally] goes about that is at his discretion, and he can attend exec meetings, general meetings or whatever he needs to do in order to accomplish that task. His presence will not be intrusive in any way."

The club is responsible for "making sure they forward their e-mails, posters, meeting notices, etc. to Saeed, and making sure he is up to date on what they're doing," said Zavitz.

Ben-Zvi noted that Zionists at McMaster has taken the initiative to meet with members of SPHR and suggested joint programs such as monitoring campus media, but SPHR has been "unwilling" to participate.

He said he wants people to understand how serious the situation at McMaster is, "not only for the Jewish students on campus, but at McMaster particularly it's a big threat to every club."

Conference gives students Israel advocacy tips

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Fifty-five students from a dozen universities in Ontario and Quebec gathered in Ottawa earlier this month for a three-day Hasbara Fellowships Activism Conference.

The purpose was to network and glean information and techniques to deal with Israel-related issues they face on their campuses.

Many of the students had already participated in the Hasbara Fellowships program in Israel, which is designed to give them a first-hand look at the situation on the ground and to equip them to go back to their universities and explain Israel's position to other students.

Montrealer Patrick Amar, a former Concordia University student now working in New York with Hasbara Fellowships, an arm of Aish HaTorah, as its Canadian co-ordinator, said one of the group's goals is to become more politically engaged.

"I don't think we are really using the democratic process well enough," he said. "We want to reach out to politicians and establish Ottawa as a base for political action... this conference was an introduction, an ice-breaker."

Along those lines, David Cooper of the Canada-Israel Committee provided tips on how to make the Canadian political system more accessible and "friendlier," while Conservative MP Jason Kenney spoke to students during their Shabbat dinner and urged them to reach out to non-Jews and have them become active on behalf of Israel.

"He helped us with problems encountered on our campuses," Amar said. "One of the biggest issues we [Hasbara Fellowships] are facing is how to reach out and make Israel more mainstream, more accepted by more non-Zionist students... We need to reach out to students for their interests – to put what is important to them on our agenda."

"We are giving the students some armour. They are being attacked every day," Marcus said.

He was accompanied by Barbara Crook, the new Canadian representative of Palestinian Media Watch who will be following up on Canadian campuses after Marcus returns to Israel.

"Palestinians spend their whole propaganda convincing the world that they are the victims," Marcus said. "We have to show, through our provable material, that this is not true. The goal is to change the victimhood."

Marcus and Crook distributed printed material and CDs depicting propaganda being broadcast on Palestinian television, inciting children to violence and martyrdom.

"We think we give them [the students] the tools, Marcus said. "As we presented our material, we drilled them on how to answer questions. Some of these students had been to our presentations before and received our materials, and they are using them already."

The conference wrapped up on Tu b'Shvat, and students decided to buy a tree in Israel for each of their ridings and present the certificates to their MPs.

"Activism means new ideas all the time," Amar said.

Coast to Coast

All in all, we need more than shots of the wall

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"We relate to images in more direct ways than we do to words," wrote Globe and Mail arts reporter Michael Posner, in "Image World" (Queens Quarterly, summer 2003). "Text requires another level of mediation, a mental or intellectual filter of some kind that distances us from what we are reading. Images are immediate. They require less judgment, less interpretation. They appeal not to our reason but to our intuition, not to thought but to feeling. Inevitably, therefore… ever larger percentages of the population are being conditioned to respond emotionally and viscerally to the daily blizzard of images that bombard them."

In a world increasingly dominated "by the mesmerizing power of the visual," as Posner puts it, consumers of news must struggle to look past the image to the truth below the surface. Not that pictures usually lie. But images can be easily manipulated when isolated from the broader context they are taken from.

This is, after all, an age when television news – which is essentially wedded to the emotional power of images – reigns as the dominant mode of imparting information. Studies show that television is the primary news source for 75 per cent of Canadians. What's more, only six to seven per cent of newspaper readers peruse editorials and op-eds, so that most are missing out on the opinions and ideas – the broader context – behind the news.

The power of imagery, of course, affects how many view the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, due to the ready supply of "David vs. Goliath" imagery, with Israeli soldiers cast in the unflattering role of the oppressors and the Palestinians as helpless victims. Images of Israel's security fence are the just the latest chapter in this familiar story.

No matter what Israel's case is for building a security barrier near the Green Line, the media persist in showing just a tiny fraction of it – the concrete portion – as a looming monstrosity causing hardship for the Palestinians. This has tremendous emotional resonance, not only for the average person, but also for decision makers.

Israel's case is mainly conceptual. The fence is necessitated by the Palestinian Authority's refusal to stop terrorism. It is designed to thwart suicide bombers, whose infliction of carnage on Israeli civilians would, as New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman has written, have caused any other society to go out of its mind.

But the ubiquitous wire service photos of "the wall" show a huge concrete barrier, often shot from above and dwarfing a lone Palestinian woman or child. These pictures, from Associated Press, Reuters and others (which are carried in all major dailies, including the pro-Israel National Post), cannot depict the prevention of carnage. Rather, they showcase difficulty and an ominous presence, which amply serves, however unwittingly, the Palestinians' propaganda mills.

About 95 per cent of the structure is actually a fence, but that is rarely seen in news reports or photos. A partial exception was The Barrier, a two-part documentary by Elizabeth Farnsworth on NewsHour with Jim Lehrer (PBS, Feb. 9, 10). It showed extensive footage of the fence, particularly in part 1, which dealt with Israel's case. Yet, taken as a whole – part 2 explored the Palestinian perspective – The Barrier showed more wall than fence.

Unfortunately, images such as those of "the wall," which are dramatic, sensational and negative, will continue to dominate the media. It's important to counter these images with rational and coherent arguments, even while we understand that text will never have the same mass appeal.

Christian Zionist group planning 6 Israel missions in 2004

By ZEV KALIN
Special to the CJN

OTTAWA — A group of some 60 pastors and lay leaders recently participated in the launch of a "Taste of Israel" seminar series here sponsored by Return Ministries, which describes its mandate as "Christian Zionists working together for Israel."

Addressing the group, Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah Synagogue, called the event "one of the most exciting moments in my life."

He was speaking not only as a supporter of the Christian Zionist movement, but also as a leader of the upcoming joint delegation of Christians and Jews, "Together For Israel Solidarity Mission," being run by Return Ministries and B'nai Brith Canada.

The group will be in Israel from April 27 to May 6.

Also leading the trip will be Rabbi Kelman's wife Sara, Return Ministries founder and executive director Dean Bye, and his wife Patti.

The Ottawa seminar, titled "CentrAliyah," was the first in a series of training sessions intended to prepare Christian leaders to become more active in their support of Israel and North American aliyah.

According to founding member Peg Byars, "Return Ministries' mandate is to encourage Jews and Christians to work together to fulfill God's plans for Israel and the nations."

Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah Synagogue

This includes "working to implement God's plans to return His Jewish people to Israel from all corners of the Earth; revealing evidence of this happening in our time; building bridges between the Christian and Jewish communities in North America and Israel to facilitate their standing together for Israel; and helping the Church understand and embrace God's call on His gentile church to support North American aliyah."

Calling Israel "the best classroom," Dean Bye said he is planning six missions to Israel for Jews and Christians this year. Planning for 2005 has already begun, with one trip in the works so far.

The missions' goals are to build bridges between Jews and Christians and Canada and Israel, as well as showcase advancements in Israeli industry and agriculture, encourage Canadian Jews and Christians to stand together with Israel, foster an understanding of the biblical importance of the land and people of Israel and learn about the political and security situation.

Return Ministries also holds weekend seminars on Israel at its training facility in Centralia, about 40 minutes north of London, Ont. They're currently scheduled to run monthly, but Bye hopes to have the facility booked year round with weekend seminars and full-time students studying throughout the week.

Rabbi Kelman's mission will include visits to an army base and an absorption centre, as well as planting trees and meetings with Israeli political leaders.

It will also include a visit to the trauma centre at the Shaare Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem to hear how it handles victims of suicide bombers. Trip participants will also meet ZAKA Rescue and Recovery personnel who volunteer at the site of terrorist attacks with medical assistance and care for the remains of victims.

"In a way it's a sense of gratitude that I'm here to express today – gratitude and thanks to our Christian friends who have a willingness and desire to learn more about our Jewish way of life," Rabbi Kelman told the pastors.

"I have a feeling that, in certain areas, you can teach the Jewish people a lot about a commitment to Israel, a sense of reaching out, and in helping us to realize a dream."

Ellis Levine, who never dreamed that one day, he would be selling his own synagogue, is a third-generation shul member on both sides of his family.

"My grandfather sat in the first row, first seat," he recalls. "He would always sit facing my grandmother."

Because it was an Orthodox shul, the women sat in the upstairs balconies, supported by beautifully carved wood columns.

"My mother sat in the first row of the balcony with my sister and I sat with my father downstairs. I can still picture that. The families were positioned so that the women and the men could see each other."

Levine's two children had their bar and bat mitzvahs at the synagogue. He himself had his bar mitzvah there in 1953, after he had sat up all night with the body of his late grandfather, local merchant Sam Meltzer, back when funerals took place in the sanctuary.

The synagogue's last rabbi, Roger Pavey, left for good in 1982. He now has a pulpit in Saskatoon.

"We'd bring in lay leaders, but we couldn't even afford a rabbi for the High Holy Days," says Ellis Levine.

The nearest synagogues are in Moncton and Fredericton, whose communities are also struggling to hang on. The last census showed 245 Jews in Moncton, a nine per cent decline over the past decade and an average age of 40.

Things look more dire in Fredericton, where the tally found 210 Jews – a steep drop of 33 per cent over the previous 10 years – and a mean age of 49.

The shuls in both cities are Orthodox and have rabbis.

Saint John's Jewish community was founded in 1858 with the arrival of Solomon Hart and his wife from England. Fellow immigrants established the city's first synagogue, Ahavath Achim (Brotherly Love) in 1898. Hart opened a tobacco factory and most of the men were affluent cigar manufacturers.

A second wave of newcomers at the turn of the century – initially poor peddlers from eastern Europe and Russia who became merchants – opened their own shul, the Hazen Avenue Synagogue, in 1906.

The Shaare Zedek was founded in 1919 with the merger of the two small congregations into an Orthodox synagogue. It gradually became Conservative, and two years ago, was reconstituted as fully egalitarian, but along Conservative lines.

Inside Congregation Shaarei Zedek

The Jewish museum makes proud mention of the community's "Golden Age," from the 1920s to the 1960s, when there was a Jewish troop of Boy Scouts and Girl Guides, a local B'nai Brith chapter and 60 kids at the Hebrew school.

Shaare Zedek, a bit creaky and musty, was actually built in 1860 as the Calvin (Presbyterian) Church on Carleton Street. With three levels, a complete kitchen and 11,500 square feet, it would make a perfect church, theatre, arts centre or school, says Ellis Levine, ever the salesman (he was showing the building to a prospective buyer when The CJN called his cellphone).

The building is considered a deal, considering it's selling at well below its assessed value of $574,600.

If it sells – and that could take months – the congregation will have 60 to 90 days to empty the synagogue of its six Torah scrolls, several memorial plaques, the eternal light, the Aron Kodesh, prayer books and other artifacts.

A sale would certainly boost the community's finances. Levine says it would offset many of the outstanding members' dues and help fund the museum, the Hebrew classes and the local Jewish cemetery, established in 1882, for years to come.

This Passover could be the last time the community will gather at the synagogue. After that, says Levine, "it depends on how good a salesman I am."

Vancouver campaign raises record $5.5 million

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) says its annual Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) fundraising campaign collected more than $5.5 million in 2003, a new record.

The amount represents a $1-million increase over 2002. The extra donations will be divided between programs in Vancouver, Canada, Israel and Diaspora communities in other parts of the world, community leaders say.

Mark Gurvis, JFGV executive director, said the 2003 CJA campaign was a "breakthrough" for the Vancouver Jewish community. "Five-and-a-half million dollars is where we hope we'll be starting from for the 2004 campaign."

Donors gave an average 23.6 per cent more in 2003 than in 2002. There were a total of 3,461 individual donations, including 436 from donors who did not contribute to the 2002 campaign.

The 2003 drive marks the second consecutive year of significantly increased contributions.

The campaign's theme – "What will tomorrow hold if we don't act today?" – mirrored the one used elsewhere in Canada and was prompted by the Vancouver community's concern for terrorism and economic decline in Israel and increasing anti-Semitism around the world, including British Columbia.

Gurvis said the 2002 and 2003 campaigns focused on Israel and global threats facing Jewish people. "Following the emergencies in Israel and overseas and the clear articulation of our needs, the Jewish community in Vancouver responded."

David Berson, JFGV director of community planning, said the campaign funds five program areas in the local community: social services, youth, arts and culture, formal childhood education and community building. Programs are developed and delivered by 25 community agencies.

The campaign also finances programs in Canada that advocate on behalf of Israel and combat anti-Semitism. The newly established Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) will receive $250,000.

Two-thirds of 2003 new funding will go to Israel and overseas. In Israel, CJA contributions will aid victims of terror, help provide vital services that have suffered due to the country's declining economy and support social and educational programs.

Funds will also go to a new educational initiative in Vancouver's partnership community in the northern Galilee. The Jewish community in Argentina, which has been hard hit by that country's ongoing economic crisis, will also receive assistance.

Before 2002, CJA campaign contributions had remained relatively stable for a number of years at between $3.9 and $4.3 million. In 2002, the figure jumped to $4.56 million, thanks to the Israel Now Emergency Campaign, which raised more than $2.25 million, and rose again last year.

Gurvis said the Vancouver Jewish community, which has about 23,000 people, has more in common with communities in Seattle, Portland and San Francisco than with those in Montreal, Toronto or Winnipeg.

"Vancouver shows a 'West Coast mentality' in its looser forms of community affiliation," he said. "It's not like Winnipeg here, and it never will be, either."

The Vancouver community is no longer concentrated along Oak Street on Vancouver's west side, but is scattered all over the Lower Mainland.

Senate to examine anti-Semitism in Canada

Grafstein said many of the OSCE's 55-member states have already adopted the resolution, with France going so far to strengthen its anti-hate laws. Several OSCE states have held seminars on anti-Semitism. But Canada has lagged behind and even though Grafstein has pushed the issue in the Senate for some time, he believes his colleagues don't feel the urgency to act.

"Why shouldn't the Senate drag its feet?" he asked. "If there's no pressure to do something from the public, it indicates it really isn't a concern."

Grafstein noted his fellow Senators had not received a single letter from the Jewish community in the last year-and-a-half urging them to study the growth of anti-Semitism.

He cited two examples where he believes the Jewish community and its more prominent members have been remiss in addressing the issue. The first, he said, was that the community and Jewish recipients of the Order of Canada have not pushed hard enough to strip former Native leader David Ahenakew of his Order. Ahenakew attracted national attention at a December 2002 meeting of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations, when he said Hitler was justified in "frying" six million Jews.

Grafstein also pointed to the case of Esther Delisle, author of The Traitor and the Jew, an examination of anti-Semitism and fascism in Quebec society, who has found it difficult to find an academic position in Quebec after the book was released.

Grafstein suggested both were clear cases of anti-Semitism in action.

His resolution has been referred to the Senate's human rights committee for debate and the committee will hear witnesses on the current state of anti-Semitism in Canada.

The committee should begin work within a few weeks.

"I can't find another time when a committee of parliament examined this question. It's quite historic," Grafstein said.

He said he hoped the Senate will do more than merely investigate the issue.

"This is not about a resolution. It's about searching out case studies and seeing if they can be rectified."

Manuel Prutschi, acting national executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "We'd certainly welcome the opportunity to appear before the Senate on the issue. We have much to say on it.

"Anti-Semitism has re-emerged as an insidious evil throughout the world and we look toward Canada to play a leading role internationally in combatting it within the broader context of the human rights agenda."

The effect of anti-Semitism has hit Grafstein close to home. A member of Beth Tzedec Congregation, one of Toronto's largest synagogues, he is angry that members are forced to enter through a security door at the rear of the building. Toronto mosques and churches have not had to enact such security measures. What's more, he said, members are "taxed" $100-$150 per year for security, while in Germany, the government bears the full cost of police security at Jewish houses of worship.

"That's outrageous in Canada in the year 2004. We're not talking Canada in 1933."

Ambassador's daughter continues to promote Mideast peace

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Many countries are content to have just one envoy here to promote their interests, but Israel, it seems, has two high-profile representatives in our capital showcasing the strengths of the Jewish state.

One is Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

But his daughter Michelle, a 17-year-old high school student at Ottawa's private Ashbury College, has been receiving a great deal of attention of her own over the past year for her unofficial diplomatic efforts to break down barriers in pursuit of Mideast peace.

In recognition of their work, both father and daughter will be honoured by State of Israel Bonds at a tribute dinner May 12 called "Ambassadors for Peace."

After a heated debate about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in one of her high school classes last year, Michelle began a journey that has changed her life and, she hopes, the lives of many others.

Her relationships with the daughter of the Jordanian ambassador and an Iranian-Canadian Muslim girl who had come directly from Saudi Arabia had been strained.

"If I can't even get along with two Arab girls living in Canada, how can I expect there to be peace back home?" Michelle recalls thinking. "I approached them and we reached an understanding. We decided to use this as an example for others."

The three classmates began speaking to groups of students and adults at various venues around Ottawa about the importance of getting past stereotypes by learning about one another as people. In the process, they became good friends themselves.

"The other two girls dropped out of the initiative because of academic pressure and I continued on my own," said Michelle. "I decided that while words are important, they are not enough. I am now organizing a summer camp and bringing 15 Israeli and 15 Palestinian teenagers to Ottawa this summer for a summer camp that will be held at Ashbury College."

> Michelle spends a great deal of time working on her own personal peace initiative

Michelle is single-handedly organizing the entire project, helped only by a small committee of local businesspeople and professionals – Jewish and Arab – whom she has approached to help with fundraising.

"The idea is to take [campers] out of their usual environment with all the stigmas. There are not only physical borders, but emotional ones as well. Based on my own experience, human contact is also needed for peace. You can't just have a piece of paper. I realize how satisfying it is to actually meet someone as a person and get to know the so-called enemy."

In the midst of studying for exams and going to university placement interviews, Michelle, who will defer her studies and return to Israel to do her required military service next fall, spends a great deal of time working on her own personal peace initiative.

"She spends three or four hours a day on this, even neglecting her studies," said her proud father, who doesn't seem overly concerned about her falling behind academically.

Michelle's initiative is her own, but her optimism for peace comes naturally, her father said.

"In Israel, there are two schools of thought: those who say there will never be peace and we have to get used to living with conflict, and there are many, many others who believe that peace is possible. I tend to believe that the majority believe that we will have peace... I belong in this camp."

Both Divons believe strongly that peace will come one day and that every single Israeli and Palestinian can help bring it about sooner.

After meeting with Israeli and Palestinian teens on a trip to Israel last month, Michelle concluded that "they all want peace. It is just that we don't agree on what that means or how to get there."

Montreal loses CJC plenary to Ottawa

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) will hold its next triennial plenary assembly in Ottawa, a first for the capital.

The June 13 gathering was originally planned for Montreal, which last hosted the event in 1995.

The plenary – CJC's 27th – will mark only the second time in Congress' 85-year history that a city other than Montreal or Toronto has hosted the event. In 1998, it was in Winnipeg.

According to Ron Singer, CJC's communications director in Ottawa, the site was moved, in part, to enable officials from Congress and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) to hold meetings with parliamentarians the following day, June 14.

It will also be the first plenary assembly in Ottawa since a CJC office was established there six years ago.

"It's a great way to showcase our presence here and the Ottawa Jewish community's. The timing was right."

Both Singer and Joseph Gabay, president of CJC-Quebec region, said the Quebec region's officers went along unanimously with the decision after a promise that the plenary assembly would return to Montreal in 2007.

But Casper Bloom, who chairs CJC-Q's community relations committee, told The CJN that Ottawa was picked as a compromise site by CJC's national executive committee following a "tug of war" between Montreal and Toronto.

In November 2003, CJC-Q staffer Rebecca Rosenberg told a meeting of CJC-Q's executive committee that there were overtures to have the plenary moved to Toronto because it had double the Jewish population and could therefore inspire greater attendance.

The region's executive passed a unanimous motion at that time calling for the plenary to remain in Montreal.

Ottawa "was not our first choice, Bloom said. "I'm disappointed. I would have preferred Montreal. But we agreed to it."

The Ottawa plenary will be a pared-down event compared to those of a generation ago, when three- or four-day affairs were the rule.

Now, Singer suggested, costs have become too high and people's time too scarce.

Still, he expected the event to be very successful, with 400 to 500 delegates expected to gather at the city's Westin Hotel. Organizers have also issued an invitation to Prime Minister Paul Martin.

The plenary assembly is being chaired by Montrealer Goldie Hershon – a past CJC president – and Gerry Levitz, a former president of Ottawa's Jewish Community Council.

At writing, no candidates to succeed the current CJC president, Keith Landy, whose term expires at plenary time, had declared themselves. The nomination deadline for national officers is mid-April.

Singer said CJC was still "working on" the theme for the event, but it will likely focus on the organization's 85th anniversary.

Women's Torah reading at Ghetto Synagogue

By ERICA BREGMAN

On Jan. 24, an unusually cold Shabbat morning, a separate women's Torah reading was added to the traditional services at the Ghetto Synagogue.

The Ghetto Synagogue, a townhouse close to the McGill University campus, was converted to a synagogue three years ago. During the week, the synagogue serves as a café, offering hot kosher lunches. Shabbat meals and Shlomo Carlebach-style prayer services for university students are available from September through May.

Guest Voice

A month of planning went into organizing last month's women's Torah reading. Head organizer, third-year philosophy student Rachel Ptashny, credits Miriam Walfish, a fourth-year student in Jewish studies, for recording a tape of the Torah portion Vayera and meeting with each reader before the service.

Ptashny felt it was important to offer female students an alternative form of personal and religious expression.

"So many women in the Montreal Jewish student community already display a deep commitment to Jewish life and values. Organizing a women's Torah reading was one way I could allow women to deepen their connection to Jewish observance and ritual," she said.

Organizers were delighted at the turnout – about 60 women attended the first ever women's Torah reading at the Ghetto synagogue. Since the women far outnumbered the men, the men, on their own initiative, moved to a smaller room to chant the Torah portion, while the women remained in the main sanctuary to read from the Torah borrowed from a local synagogue.

In conformity with Jewish law, female students refrained from reciting the traditional blessing before reading from the Torah, substituting instead a verse from Psalms.

To include as many readers as possible, organizers divided the Torah portion into 18 readings instead of the regular seven. Subdividing the text facilitated maximum participation by women who had formal training in reading from the Torah for their batmitzvah and women who very recently learned the cantillation system.

Clearly a heterodox group of women, the students who read and participated in the separate women's Torah reading identified with all streams of Judaism. Morrisa Golden, one of the Torah readers known in the Jewish student community for her beautiful cantorial voice, grew up in the Reform movement and continues to fully identify with its egalitarian stance.

"I am far from Orthodox," says Golden, a third-year student in international development and Middle Eastern studies. "But there is something exciting and enlightening about being part of a modern Orthodox service that explores the option of allowing women to participate in the beautiful and powerful experience of reading from the Torah."

Also in attendance were several non-Jewish students who heard about the service through friends and wanted to experience first-hand traditional Jewish prayer that included female participation.

"The readings were strikingly beautiful," said Helen Dixon, a fourth-year religious studies student at McGill, "both because they were so well done and because you could see how much they meant to each participant."

The response to this event would indicate that a women's Torah reading within a modern Orthodox setting has wide appeal. Orthodox feminist Blu Greenberg formulated this challenge of including women in traditional prayer services in her seminal book On Women and Judaism: "The task of religious leaders today is to find a way to balance the new moral and ethical judgments regarding women and the ritual aspects of Halachah [Jewish law]. It is not automatically [right] to foreclose on every opportunity to raise women to new levels of liturgical and communal involvement."

Indeed, thanks in part to student initiative, women's roles in local modern Orthodox prayer services are slowly changing. More women's Torah readings at the Ghetto Synagogue are being planned.

Rejoining the Hillel family

By SIMON BENSIMON

We are all alumni of something: high schools, universities, summer camps, Israel trips or maybe just the old neighbourhood.

Some of these institutions are very good about staying in touch with their alumni. You become part of their "family" and get invited to "family functions." Universities are the best at keeping in touch, creating a direct link between present-day students and alumni and helping many of us feel young.

In my capacity as executive director of Hillel Montreal, rarely a day passes without someone telling me that they, too, hung out at Hillel when they were at school. More often than not, people have very fond memories of days spent at Hillel House or Centre Hillel. It's especially touching when I meet people at Hillel House and they tell me where the offices were in 1975, how they got their first student loan, how they ran a special program for "out-of-town" students and what a wonderful man the late Hillel director Herb Weinstein was (his picture is still displayed in our office).

To keep that history alive and link it to the present, Hillel Montreal is embarking on an aggressive strategy to connect with our alumni.

Our message to them is that many good things are going on with Jewish students these days, very much like when they were students, and they should know about them and become involved.

So, if you were ever a Jewish student in Montreal, we want to hear from you. Call us at 514-845-9171, send me an e-mail at simon@hillel.ca, or drop me a line at Hillel House, 3460 Stanley St., Montreal, Quebec, H3A 1R8.

In exchange, we will share some of our accomplishments (and challenges) with you, and – hopefully – you might even want to get involved once again.

Rose Reisman says there's no excuse for not eating healthy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Hectic schedules don't have to get in the way of having a variety of nutritious, quick and easy meals on the table most nights, says Rose Reisman, cookbook author, nutritional consultant and owner of the Rose Reisman Cooking School.

In her newest book, Weekday Wonders, Healthy Light Meals for Every Day, Reisman, a mother of four, shows that with a little organization, families can "can eat well and break out of the rut of eating the same four or five recipes over and over again.

"People always tell me they want to get dinner on the table quickly, and so most of my recipes can be prepared in 25 to 30 minutes, including preparation and cooking time.

"If you have a pantry full of [such items as] canned tomatoes, tuna, soya sauce, rice, pasta, beans, vinegar, tomato paste, some bottled sauces such as hoisin, as well as a supply of fruits and vegetables, you can always put something together.

"Add some chicken and ground beef, which stays in the freezer for three months, and you are really cooking."

The trick, she says, is to be organized. "You can't join the gym without running shoes, and you can't broaden your recipe base without some ingredients. The priority is to order your life."

She begins the book with a month of menus, including nutritional analysis, as well as a shopping list and storage tips, and offers a make-ahead section about things you can prepare in advance.

"The main course, often, is enough nutritionally to stand alone, but feel free to add a salad, soup or side dish."

If her quick recipes are not quite fast enough for you, Reisman also has a list of super-quick recipes. "I want people to know there is no substitute for a healthy home-made dinner.

Proceeds from the cookbook – her 14th – are going to the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation. Over the past nine years, she has raised more than $1 million for the foundation through the sale of her cookbooks.

ROASTED CORN BLACK BEAN SALAD

Salad
2 cups drained canned corn
½ cup chopped sweet onions
1 tsp. minced garlic
1½ cups diced mango
1 cup rinsed and drained canned black beans
¼ cup chopped sweet red or yellow peppers lettuce leaves

Dressing
⅓ cup chopped fresh coriander
3 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. orange juice concentrate, thawed
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 tsp. minced garlic
¼ to ½ tsp. hot pepper sauce

In a non-stick skillet sprayed with cooking spray and set over medium heat, cook corn for 8 minutes, stirring often, or until slightly charred. Stir in onions and garlic and cook for 2 minutes longer. Transfer to a bowl and cool. To make dressing: in a small bowl, whisk together dressing ingredients. To make salad: stir mango, beans, and peppers into cooled corn mixture. Pour dressing over and toss to coat. Serve on lettuce leaves.

YELLOW SPLIT PEA SOUP

2 tsp. vegetable oil
1 cup chopped onions
1 cup chopped carrots
1 cup chopped celery
2 tsp. minced garlic
5 cups chicken or vegetable stock
1 cup diced, peeled potatoes
1 cup dried yellow split peas
⅛ tsp. salt and pepper

Garnish
¼ cup chopped green onions
¼ cup low-fat plain yogurt (optional)

In a non-stick saucepan sprayed with cooking spray, heat oil over medium-high heat. Cook onions, carrots, celery, and garlic for 5 minutes, or until vegetables are softened and starting to brown. Stir in remaining ingredients. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat to medium-low, cover and cook for 30 to 35 minutes, or until split peas are tender. In batches, purée soup in a blender or food processor. Serve soup sprinkled with green onions and (if using) a dollop of yogurt.

CHICKEN STIR-FRY WITH HOISIN PLUM SAUCE

Sauce
½ cup plum sauce
¼ cup hoisin sauce
2 tbsp. soy sauce
3 tbsp. water
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1½ tsp. minced garlic
1 tsp. chopped ginger root

Stir fry
12 oz. boneless skinless chicken breasts (about 3), cubed
3 tbsp. corn starch
2 tsp. vegetable oil
2 cups sliced sweet red peppers
1½ cups sliced sweet green peppers
1 cup sliced water chestnuts

Garnish
¼ cup chopped fresh coriander or basil
2 tbsp. toasted chopped cashews or peanuts

To make sauce: in a bowl, mix sauce ingredients together until smooth. Set aside. To make stir-fry: dust chicken with corn starch. In a non-stick skillet sprayed with cooking spray, heat oil. Stir chicken just until browned on all sides, about 5 minutes. Remove and set aside. Re-spray pan. Add peppers and stir fry for 5 minutes, until softened. Add water chestnuts, sauce, and chicken. Cook on medium heat for 3 minutes until chicken is cooked and sauce coats mixture. Transfer to a serving platter and sprinkle with garnishes.

BONELESS CHICKEN THIGH CACCIATORE

¼ cup all-purpose flour
2 tsp. vegetable oil
1½ cups diced onions
1 cup diced sweet green peppers
1 cup diced mushrooms
2 tsp. minced garlic
1½ tsp. dried basil
1 tsp. dried oregano
2 cups tomato pasta sauce
½ cup chicken stock
¼ cup diced rehydrated sun-dried tomatoes
1 tbsp. brown sugar

Garnish
¼ cup chopped fresh basil (optional)

Dust chicken with flour. In a non-stick skillet sprayed with cooking spray, heat oil over medium heat. Cook chicken until seared and browned on all sides, but not cooked all the way through, about 5 minutes. Remove from pan and set aside. Re-spray skillet. Cook onions for 5 minutes, or until softened and browned. Stir in green peppers, mushrooms, and garlic. Cook for 5 minutes, or until vegetables are soft. Stir in remaining ingredients and chicken. Bring to a boil, cover, and simmer on low heat for 15 minutes. Garnish with basil (if using) before serving.

YUKON GOLD AND SWEET POTATO MASH

8 large unpeeled garlic cloves (bake while boiling potatoes)
1 medium Yukon Gold potato (about 8 oz.), peeled and cubed
1 medium sweet potato (about 8 oz.), peeled and cubed
2 tbsp. grated parmesan cheese
2 tbsp. 2% evaporated milk
1 tbsp. olive oil
¼ tsp. each salt and freshly ground black pepper

Garnish
2 tbsp. finely chopped fresh parsley

Preheat oven or toaster oven to 425. Wrap garlic cloves in foil. Bake for 20 minutes or until soft. Meanwhile, place potatoes and sweet potatoes in a saucepan, covering them with cold water. Bring to a boil and cook for 15 to 20 minutes, or until tender when pierced with the tip of a sharp knife. Drain. Squeeze garlic from skins, and add garlic to potatoes with remaining ingredients. Mash potato mixture until smooth. Serve sprinkled with parsley.

Toronto based food entrepeneurs help spark Israel's economy.

Sobey's at Clark and Hilda and its manager lead the way

Israel's economy has suffered severely during the last few years; the continuing intifadah has crippled Israeli tourism and caused the rise in numbers of disabled war and terror victims. Many companies are downsizing and reluctantly laying off employees due to lower demand for consumer products.

The government of Israel, to help overcome this desperate situation, has launched through its export institute a massive campaign called "Fine Food From Israel", appealing to North American Jewish Consumers to boost Israel's economy by buying Israeli products.

Yael Soglowek-Ender is a partner and shareholder of Soglowek Food Industries in Israel, and CEO of Zoglos Vegetarian Choice, the North American branch of Soglowek Ltd. Her husband Henry Ender is CEO of Foodfest International, fastest growing distributor and manufacturer of kosher food products in Canada. The Enders are both very involved in the importation of food products from Israel to the North American market. They have decided to rise to the occasion and do something to help Israel.

Israel needs your support

Yael's long time involvement with Beit Halochem - aid to disabled war veterans and victims of terror attacks - gave both an idea: helping the economy in Israel by promoting Israeli products, and pledging 1% of all sales of these products to Beit Halochem Canada. In this way, they are helping to raise funds to rehabilitate war and terror attacked disabled victims.

In their quest to launch their campaign the Enders are attempting to contact all the food stores in the Jewish community and ask them to participate by carrying a larger variety of Israeli products and promoting the campaign.

The first one to answer their call and significantly increase the variety of Israeli products was Mr. Kevin Hopps, Manager of Sobey's at Clark and Hilda.

Mr. Hopps has a good understanding of the needs of his Jewish clientele and their strong affiliation to Israel. In his store, one can find the most extensive variety of fine foods from Israel at great prices.

The participating companies in the Enders' Campaign are: Zoglos Vegetarian Choice - soy, tofu and bourekas line; Zoglos Yael's Choice - cakes and pickles; Shamir/Zoglos salads, Elite - Famous line of coffee, chocolates, cakes, wafers, gums and soup mandel; Efrat - grape juice; Prigat - Famous natural juices, drinks and snacks, Jaffa juices; Ma'adanei Teiman - cigars, pastels and egg rolls; Telmas - Knorr soups, Richon matzoh products and pretzels; Einat soup and salad croutons; Rivit - natural snow sugarless snacks; Hanamal - marshmallows; Mottola - olives and Prichen pickles.

Henry and Yael invite anybody who imports Israeli goods to join this effort and call on the Jewish families in Canada to seek out and buy Israeli products even if they cost slightly more.

Israel needs your support!

Love is the main ingredient in 'Cooking from the Heart'

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

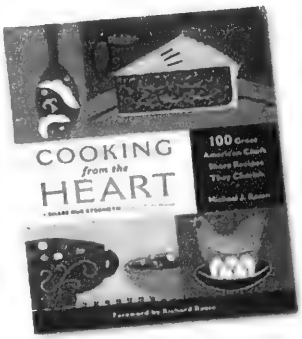
February is usually associated with hearts, flowers and love. It's also the perfect time to enjoy a joyous collection of recipes in which love is always the first ingredient – Cooking from the Heart: 100 Great American Chefs Share Recipes They Cherish, compiled by Michael Rosen (Broadway Books, $44.95 Cdn).

Cooking from the Heart contains never-before published recipes from 100 of the most beloved and well-known chefs in America. Lisa Schroeder, chef-owner of Mother's Bistro & Bar in Portland, Ore., shares heartwarming food memories of her life in Israel and her aromatic recipe for Moroccan Poached Halibut in a herb sauce she first ate with her Moroccan ex-in-laws. Award-winning pastry chef and author Gale Gand, part-owner of Tru in Chicago, tells about making pie crusts with her young son, using her great-grandmother's rolling pin that's been in their family for five generations. These are just a few of the stories and recipes that are sure to touch your heart.

Cooking from the Heart presents a wonderful range of cooking possibilities. The book is organized into sections for starters, brunch and lighter dishes, soups and stews, pasta and rice, fish, poultry, meats, salads and side dishes, desserts – all written for the home kitchen.

Each chef not only contributes a superb dish – whether a holiday tradition, comfort food, cross-cultural innovation or family classic – but also the story of why that dish means the world to them. The chefs speak as parents, children, partners, husbands, wives, friends and neighbours. The heartwarming stories and recipes are ones you will cherish; they will trigger food memories of those special dishes that are your own personal touchstones.

Cooking from the Heart is not a kosher cookbook, but that won't matter once you start turning the pages and discover the touching stories and special dishes that bind families together. They are sure to remind you of your own family's mealtimes and traditions.



A portion of the proceeds from the sale of Cooking from the Heart will benefit Share Our Strength, an anti-hunger agency. Share Our Strength has distributed more than $68 million to fight hunger worldwide.

Gale Gand firmly believes that you live forever through your recipes if you take the time to pass them down. She says: "Maybe you wonder what people will say about you in your obituary, but in my family, we think of what five dishes people will remember us by. Don't we get to visit with family members we've lost when we cook their dishes?"

MOROCCAN POACHED HALIBUT
Chef Lisa Schroeder

For the fish:
4 5-oz. fillets halibut or salmon
1 bunch fresh cilantro
1 bunch fresh flat-leaf parsley salt and freshly ground black pepper
10 whole garlic cloves
1 lemon, sliced
4 whole serrano chiles

For the cooking liquid:
1 cup vegetable oil
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1½ tsp. paprika
⅛ tsp. cayenne pepper or to taste
½ tsp. salt
French bread, as an accompaniment

Rinse the fish well. Spread the cilantro and parsley (stems and leaves) in the bottom of a large saute pan. Season the fish lightly with salt and pepper and lay the fish on the bed of herbs. Place the garlic cloves, lemon slices and chiles around the fish.

Combine 1 cup water with all of the ingredients for the cooking liquid and pour this over the fish.

Cook over high heat until the liquid boils. Lower the heat to a simmer and cover the pan with a lid. Cook for 5 to 7 minutes, until the fish is almost done. Remove the lid and continue to cook until most of the water has evaporated (if the fish looks like it is going to overcook, turn the heat up to high so the water evaporates quickly, but take care not to scorch the fish).

To serve, transfer the fish from the pan with a large spatula and place on a warm platter or individual serving plates. Arrange the garlic cloves, lemon slices and peppers around as a garnish and pour the sauce (the seasoned cooking oil minus the cilantro and parsley) on and around the fish. The fish can be served immediately or at room temperature. Offer French bread for dipping into the sauce. Serves 4.

HUNGARIAN PECAN COOKIES
Pastry Chef Gale Gand

½ lb. (2 sticks) unsalted butter, softened
1 tsp. vanilla extract
2½ cups confectioners' sugar
2¼ cups all-purpose flour
1 cup finely chopped pecans

Preheat oven to 350 and lightly grease 2 cookie sheets. Combine the butter and vanilla in the bowl of an electric mixer. Add ½ cup of the confectioners' sugar and mix to incorporate. Slowly add the flour and pecans and mix just to combine. Place the remaining 2 cups confectioners' sugar on a plate and set aside.

Roll small balls of dough (¾ inch in diameter) and arrange them on the prepared cookie sheet, 1½ inches apart. Bake for 15 to 20 minutes, or until golden brown.

Remove the cookies from the oven and immediately place them deep in the sugar. Let them cool slightly, 3 to 5 minutes, then roll each cookie in the sugar until well coated. Place the cookies on a wire rack to cool completely. Store in an airtight container. Makes 4 dozen cookies.

Quake, snow blamed for collapse near Wall

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A comprehensive inspection of the stability of the Temple Mount compound and the surrounding walls is urgently required, archeologist Eilat Mazar said Sunday after visiting the site where an embankment near the Western Wall collapsed last Saturday night.

"A major collapse at the site, which would cause a major disaster, is only a matter of time," she warned.

Mazar, who runs a Hebrew University project to publish the findings of archeological digs on the Temple Mount, is also a member of the Committee for Preventing the Destruction of Antiquities on the Temple Mount and a senior fellow at the Shalem Center.

She said state agencies are perpetually engaged in "putting out fires" when it comes to the stability of the Temple Mount and its walls, but have avoided comprehensive inspection, supervision and preservation of the site.

Pieces of the collapsed embankment slid into the women's section of the prayer area, but nobody was hurt as they were all on the far side of the area, near the demarcation with the men's section. Until the embankment is repaired, the men's section will be divided in two and part of it turned over to the women.

The latest collapse is not the first such event in recent years. A few months ago, the western wall of the Temple Mount's Museum of Islam, which also lies near the Wall, collapsed. For the past two years, Antiquities Authority experts and a delegation from Jordan have been working to fix a growing bulge in the southern wall of the Temple Mount compound, a job that has still not been completed.

Recently, the Jordanian Ministry of Awqaf and Islamic Affairs and Holy Places announced that it also intends to fix an older bulge in the compound's eastern wall. This bulge has been there for decades, but recently fears have grown that it is no longer stable.

According to the archeologists of the Committee for Preventing the Destruction of Antiquities on the Temple Mount, the underground work done by the Muslim Waqf and the Israeli Islamic Movement in the area of Solomon's Stables and the Al Aqsa Mosque over the last few years has altered the land and increased the danger of a collapse. The Waqf rejects this, saying it employed authorized engineers to supervise all the work.

On Sunday, the Waqf charged that the archaeological excavations Israel is conducting at the foot of the Western Wall caused the collapse of the embankment Saturday night. But the Antiquities Authority said the most likely explanation is that the collapse was brought on by a combination of last Wednesday's earthquake and Saturday's heavy snowfall. Mazar also thinks the earthquake was the main cause of the collapse.

CIJA: Making a Difference

In a little over a month the newly-formed CIJA (Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy) has already begun to pave several "paths of partnership".

"CIJA is achieving two of its most important objectives – ensuring that all members of the Jewish community have a place in advocacy activities, and that all sectors of the broader Canadian community see value in cooperating with us and opportunities to do so," says Co-Chair Steven Cummings. "Through its partnership initiatives, CIJA is focused on activities that will lead to improved advocacy and increased support for Israel and other causes of deep concern."

One can see the stronger partnership links that are being forged by each of the major organizations that are part of the CIJA umbrella.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) has launched a series of initiatives, both in Ottawa and at the grass roots, to broaden Government and media understanding and support of Israel. As an example, CIC made several interventions with the federal government, explaining why Israel's decision to construct a security fence - to protect its citizens from suicide bombers - should not be reviewed by the International Court of Justice (ICJ). "We're delighted that Foreign Minister Bill Graham directed his department to submit a written affidavit stating Canada's objections to the ICJ examining the issue of the fence. And we continue to address the challenges in enhancing the bilateral relationship," says Co-Chair Brent Belzberg.

The Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has continued to battle anti-Semitism, uphold human rights, encourage staying the course in the war on terrorism, promote civil discourse and foster positive intergroup relations as part of playing its leadership role in advocating on quality of Jewish life issues in Canada and abroad. A reflection of CJC's active participation in the Canadian Christian Jewish Consultation is the recent statement condemning anti-Semitism, issued by the leaders of nine of Canada's main churches, through the facilitation of the Canadian Council of Churches.

CJC also recently intervened in the Department of Foreign Affairs' annual human rights non-governmental organizations consultations. CJC's intervention centred on the alarming rise in global anti-Semitism and urged Canada, as a country concerned with human rights to take a leading role at the upcoming session of the UN Commission on Human Rights.

The National Committee for Jewish Campus Life (NCJCL) is engaged in one of the most crucial activities, building a positive environment on campus for Jewish students and for Israel in the midst of viciously negative anti-Israel campaigns. "Canada's campuses are home to many of Canada's future leaders," says CIJA CEO Hershell Ezrin. "It is crucial that we make Israel's case among university students, and not let slanders and libels stand."

One of the campus organization's most productive recent initiatives was a mission to Israel for non-Jewish student leaders who got a first-hand understanding of issues they had previously only heard about through the media. One result was that a Concordia-based Amnesty International representative who participated on the tour subsequently invited Concordia Hillel to participate in an Amnesty-organized event on campus.

CIJA- Public Affairs Committee (CIJA-PAC) is a critical part of CIJA's mandate to speak with an effective voice on key issues, and is the means by which individuals can participate in advocacy activities. Hundreds of Canadians from across the country have already joined in the first weeks of operation. The first of a series of ongoing membership surveys has gone out, providing members with an institutionalized means of expressing their opinion and shaping agendas on issues key to Jewish communal leadership across the country.

"These are just some of the ways that CIJA is marshalling support for our concerns among other communities," says Belzberg. "The key word is partnership. That is what we are building."

CIJA is an umbrella organization for Jewish community advocacy efforts, helping to improve the quality of Jewish life in Canada, increase support for Israel, and strengthen the Canada-Israel relationship. CIJA brings together such organizations as the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee, the National Committee for Jewish Campus Life, and the CIJA Public Affairs Committee (CIJA-PAC). CIJA is an initiative of UIA Federations Canada, with the Canadian Jewish Federations and Regional Communities.

Worse than anti-Semitism

Comment

Last November, Neil Mackay, one of the editors of the Scottish Sunday Herald, published an article in which he recycled claims made in some Arab circles that Mossad agents in the United States knew in advance of the terror plot to attack the World Trade Center and did nothing to prevent it. Up to that point, this insane accusation had been limited to extremist Arab propagandists and neo-Nazis. The Glasgow newspaper found it proper to repeat this canard without citing its source, as an expression of faith in its accuracy.

The article shocked Labour MP Jim Murphy and Jewish leader Lord Greville, who protested and asked the paper's editor to print a correction. The editor refused, saying the report was based on verified sources. In his letter to Lord Janner, the editor asked him not to fall into the trap of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon by condemning everyone who disagrees with him as an anti-Semite, even though Janner's letter contained no such accusation.

As an example of Mackay's self righteousness, the paper's editor cited articles Mackay had written condemning anti-Semitism. He failed to mention, for some reason, that some of his best friends are Jews. The simplest way to answer the editor of the Sunday Herald is for the State of Israel to sue the paper for libel, which the Foreign Ministry is now considering.

But the problem is that the article in the Scottish newspaper is only one extreme example of the wild and hysterical attacks on Israel, and not only because of the occupation and the settlements. In such attacks, Israel is portrayed virulently, as a monstrous country capable not only of harming Palestinians, but of not preventing mass murder in New York if it serves its base interests.

Anyone who knows even a little bit about Israel knows that the way it is reported in some major newspapers bears no resemblance to the country itself and that such lies contravene every rule of journalism. The reports in these papers ignore the complexities of its society and present Israel as a caricature – the same one that appears in the Arab press, where every Israeli is a monster stomping on an unfortunate Arab.

Things have reached the point where during a conference on anti-Semitism organized by cabinet minister Natan Sharansky two weeks ago, a Jewish delegate from Sweden expressed satisfaction over the incident in which the Israeli ambassador in Sweden damaged an exhibit he interpreted as praising the female suicide bomber of Haifa's Maxim restaurant. He was pleased, he said, because through the incident, many Swedes heard about terror against Israeli civilians for the first time.

Is there anti-Semitism in all of this? Anti-Semitism certainly explains writing villainously about Israel, but it doesn't explain everything. Something more serious may be afoot. Traditional anti-Semitism did not accept Jews in Christian society, but it usually did not negate their right, at least in principle, to exist. Before Kristallnacht – the night of broken glass in Nazi Germany – even the Nazis preached "Jews to Palestine."

The anti-Semitic tone of newspapers such as the Sunday Herald negates the Jewish right to exist by delegitimizing the State of Israel, which is described – also with the assistance of Israeli academics – as a Nazi apartheid state.

The logical conclusion of the Sunday Herald's libelous article is that a democratic country that knows about a plan to commit mass murder in New York and does nothing to prevent it has no right at all to exist. This is worse than anti-Semitism.

This is negating the right of the Jewish people to self-determination. When such views are accompanied by a rise in anti-Semitism, it takes us back as Jews to dark days.

However, Israel won't remain entirely on the sidelines in the closely watched case. The Foreign Ministry is dispatching spokespeople, hundreds of Israeli demonstrators plan to fly to the Netherlands, and the Israeli rescue service ZAKA is sending the skeleton of a Jerusalem bus mangled in a Palestinian suicide bombing.

The International Court of Justice, also known as the World Court, agreed to hold hearings in response to a request by the United Nations General Assembly for a non-binding opinion on whether Israel is legally obliged to tear down the barrier.

Israel says it is a security fence to keep out Palestinian suicide bombers.

Palestinians object to the planned route of the barrier, slated to cut deep into the West Bank with a network of metal fences, razor wire and concrete wall. They hope for a ruling that will exert international pressure on Israel to stop the project.

Israel has signalled it might shift the barrier's route in response to U.S. pressure.

The Israeli rescue service ZAKA said it is flying the charred frame of a Jerusalem bus blown up by a Palestinian suicide bomber to The Hague. Eleven people were killed and dozens wounded in the bombing last month.

ZAKA members collect body parts of victims in the aftermath of suicide bombings. The rescue service said ZAKA volunteers would stand outside the court alongside the bus and talk to passers-by about their work.

An Israeli grassroots group, meanwhile, is arranging for discount flights to The Hague for Israeli demonstrators. Shahar Ervin, the director of the group, the Citizens Coalition, said more than 600 people have approached him.

Israel will declare 3 MIAs killed in action

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The Israel Defence Forces will declare three MIAs from the 1982 Sultan Yaqub battle – Zecharia Baumel, Yehuda Katz, and Zvi Feldman – as fallen soldiers whose burial place is unknown.

The families of the soldiers were to be informed of the decision Monday, but release of the announcement was delayed.

Over the past two years, a special PoW and MiA committee from the IDF's military intelligence branch has investigated all information available, to review assumptions regarding the fate of the three missing IDF men.

The committee was appointed by the head of the IDF's personnel directorate, Maj.-Gen. Gil Regev. A few weeks ago, the panel concluded that, based on an analysis of new information and existing materials, the three men should be regarded as soldiers who were killed in the line of duty. There is no evidence to support a belief that the three are alive, the committee found.

The panel's findings were relayed to the IDF's chief chaplain, Rabbi Yisrael Weiss, who reviewed the information and concluded that the finding is not at variance with Jewish law.

A few years ago, the IDF made a similar effort to declare the three as fatalities, after studying the intelligence information available at the time. Under pressure from the families, the army refrained from issuing an announcement.

The three MiAs were in a battle near the Sultan Yaqub village on June 12, 1982, during the first week of the Lebanon War. Katz commanded one of the two tanks that disappeared during the battle. Baumel and Feldman served in the other tank.

Analysis

Toward an 'Islamic bomb?'

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

One has to be naive to the point of stupidity to believe that the Pakistani government did not know about the transfer of nuclear know-how to a number of countries, most of them Muslim, by the person considered to be the father of the Pakistani atomic bomb, Abdul Qadeer Khan.

This was a complex operation that went on for years and included extensive deals, the movement of equipment, training and managing hefty bank accounts. Scientists, technicians and others worked with Khan. It is inconceivable that neither Pakistani intelligence nor the country's military had no knowledge of these operations.

The contention that Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf knew nothing means that he has lost control of developments in his country. At the beginning of the 1990s, Pakistan transferred nuclear know-how to North Korea in return for technical information on missile development.

It is unreasonable to think that the government of Pakistan was totally blind to all the other nuclear deals since then.

The latest revelation was accompanied by a performance in which Khan confessed to his deeds and apologized. And, as expected, Musharraf forgave him.

The whole thing looks like a schoolchild's prank. Where are the millions of dollars that entered Khan's bank accounts in return for the nuclear know-how that was made available to other countries? What did the Pakistanis report to the United States about the nuclear transactions? Some of the information was known in Israel, but intelligence here was taken by surprise by Malaysia's involvement in the manufacture of centrifuges for enriching uranium for countries that purchased the know-how from Pakistan.

Without the latest discoveries by experts from the International Atomic Energy Agency at the enrichment facility in Iran, it's doubtful that the president of Pakistan would have responded. It was French inspectors who stated that the equipment at the Iran facility came from Pakistan and that Pakistan had become a leading disseminator of nuclear know-how.

In January 1991, after the nuclear tests in Pakistan, Nawaz Sharif, the country's prime minister at the time, promised that Pakistan would step up supervision of the export of nuclear technology. That promise was reiterated by Musharraf, who ousted Sharif in a coup. Musharraf dismissed claims the Pakistani bomb was intended to be the Islamic nuclear weapon.

However, Khan recently offered a different explanation for his actions. He maintains that he planned it all so Muslim countries would be able to match the West. The French are reassuring themselves by noting that the secrets were also sold to a non-Muslim country (North Korea), though that should be seen as the exception that proves the rule.

The nuclear transaction included a new Muslim country, Malaysia, which, as noted, manufactured some of the centrifuges. Some observers are now recalling that in the past, before the Musharraf period, "Pakistani elements" tried to sell centrifuges to Iraq, too, but the Iraqis, apprehensive of a sting operation, rejected the offer. Now, in light of the new revelations, it's worth re-examining the rumours about Pakistani nuclear plans made in conjunction with Saudi Arabia, which in the past funded part of the Pakistani nuclear project.

The latest revelations show that Pakistan constitutes a potential threat that has to be kept under supervision, as India has been saying for some time. Even if Musharraf is a friend of the United States, no one knows who will succeed him. Pakistan has undergone four coups since its establishment, and all of the country's prime ministers have been ousted by the army before serving their full terms. Do the Americans know, for example, where the nuclear bombs in Pakistan are stored and who the guards are? Islamist groups are becoming stronger in the country and are infiltrating the army, too.

It's more than possible that the Khan affair was only the first act in a drama that is still being played out.

Major clash in Gaza

Israeli troops killed 15 Palestinians and wounded at least 50 in an exchange of fire in a neighbourhood at the eastern edge of Gaza City in an operation to locate and destroy rocket-making facilities.

The earth moves in Israel

An eight-second earthquake rattled Israelis and Arabs last Wednesday morning. The tremor, measuring five on the Richter scale, was centred in the Dead Sea area and was felt as far away as Lebanon. In Israel, the West Bank and Gaza, people fled outdoors out of fear buildings would collapse. But damage was minimal, and Israel's emergency services reported treating 20 people for shock. Straddling the Syria-Africa rift, Israel can expect a major quake around once a century, seismologists say.

Labor would join gov't

The Labor Party would consider joining Ariel Sharon's government if the prime minister has a plan to return to peace talks. The declaration from Matan Vilnai, a leader of Labor, was the clearest to date that Sharon's ruling Likud Party can count on Labor's support if Sharon goes ahead with his announced plan to uproot most of the Jewish communities in the Gaza Strip.

Israel and the Falash Mora

The High Court of Justice agreed last Thursday to give the government more time to bring Falash Mora to Israel from Ethiopia. The government promised to verify within the next 90 days the names of those eligible to immigrate. The government will use a list of people who claim to be Falash Mora, Ethiopians whose Jewish ancestors converted to Christianity but who now are returning to Judaism. There are about 20,000 Falash Mora waiting to emigrate.

New editor at Ha'aretz

English-born journalist David Landau has been named editor-in-chief of Ha'aretz. He replaces Hanoch Marmari, who resigned last month after a 13-year tenure, the Israeli daily announced. Landau, 56, was JTA's longtime Jerusalem bureau chief. He began his career at the Jerusalem Post, but left after it was sold to Hollinger International in 1990. Following a stint at Israeli daily Ma'ariv, he co-founded Ha'aretz's English-language edition in 1993. Landau also is a contributing writer for the Economist.

Worried by Pakistan's nukes

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said Israel is "concerned" that Pakistani nuclear technology may have been passed on to dangerous groups. On a two-day visit to India las week, Shalom said countries such as India, which also has nuclear weapons, should help stop Pakistan from transferring nuclear technology to rogue states and terrorist groups.

Kids with special needs thrive at Israel's Alon Center

By MIRIAM SHAVIV

KIBBUTZ ALONIM, Israel — On a break between classes at the Alon Center, a high school in northern Israel for students with learning disabilities and special needs, students relax on a grass lawn and greet passing teachers with hugs and slaps on the back.

The calm, almost serene atmosphere is unusual in Israel, where many schools have 40 children per classroom, student violence is on the rise and school buildings are often concrete jungles.

"There's a softer tone here, a lot of respect, a less tense culture," says Alon Center co-founder Cindy Maizel. "When you walk around here, you can feel that a Canadian culture predominates."

If so, this is no coincidence: Maizel was born in Toronto and another of the centre's four founders, Dvorah Feldstein, is from Montreal. In fact, says Maizel, if it were not for their Canadian experience, the school would probably not exist.

"It's because we came from big cities that we were brave enough to try this endeavour," Maizel says. "I don't think the other two founders, from Kibbutz Alonim, would have done it without us."

The school, which is located 30 minutes north of Haifa in Kibbutz Alonim, serves the entire north. It is unique in Israel both for its size and for the range of children it helps.

There are four programs for its 110 students, each with its own building. The largest, Chayil, is for 50 children with learning disabilities, who study in groups of eight. Aleh Elon serves 30 children with emotional problems such as lack of confidence, depression and anorexia. They study in groups of four. The Amirim program caters to 15 boys with attention deficit disorder or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, who also study in groups of four, and a part-time program, Shiluv, allows 20 children to combine two days of one-on-one study in the centre with four days in the regular school system at work.

In addition to the low student-to-teacher ratio, the students receive therapy when necessary, the teachers utilize special education methods and the school allows parents to attend workshops throughout the year.

"We know we have the students for a few years," says Maizel. "But the parents have them forever."

The school's success rate speaks for itself. Feldstein says all of Alonim's students are of normal or above normal intelligence, and more than 80 per cent achieve matriculation, and 90 per cent serve in the army.

"Most of our kids come out changed people," says Maizel.

She recalls one boy "who roamed the halls in his school for years and hung out with the maintenance men."

Initially, she says, he was "in such a state," he could only join the school's part-time program, Shiluv. But after much work, and after his father attended a parenting workshop, he completed two matriculation exams.

More importantly, Maizel says, he "rehabilitated his belief in adults. He was like a sponge. You just give him love and he functions. He's learned how to control his impulsiveness, learned to apologize. He's taught me something about those qualities, too."

Both Maizel, a special-education teacher who made aliyah in 1978 after falling in love with kibbutz life, and Feldstein, a developmental psychologist who has been in Israel since 1976, have children with learning disabilities.

The Alon Center began 11 years ago as an after-school learning institute for children of all ages who needed to learn how to function in the regular school system. It was not long before the pair identified another need.

"We saw there was a certain percentage of children who still fell through the cracks and that the older they got, the less support they received," Feldstein says.

The Alon Center opened as a high school in the mid 1990s. Today, there is so much to do that Feldstein has been known to get to work at 4 a.m., but both she and Maizel say the interaction with the students and their parents is rewarding.

Still, there are significant challenges ahead. The Education Ministry, the school's largest source of funding, is undergoing significant budget cuts and could slash its grant to the school by more than 30 per cent in the coming year. As well, Israeli foundations that have helped the school in the past say they are now giving priority to food programs for hungry children, while the parents, who pay fees of about $440 (Cdn) a month, are finding it hard to pay in the current economic climate. Feldstein says there is a chance they will have to turn children away.

"We're in real trouble," she says.

In October, Feldstein went on a fund-raising trip to Canada, where she met with potential donors and raised an initial $10,000 (Cdn).

"It's a beginning," she says.

Feldstein hopes to return to Canada for more fundraising in the future. Her dream is that by the time she retires, the school won't have to charge fees.

Any growth that does occur will have to be handled carefully, to maintain the current intimate atmosphere, she says.

"Every child who wants to should be able to attend this school. But even if we remain the same size, it's a success story."

The man behind the fence

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Every week, Nezah Mashiah drives to the West Bank and surveys the largest building project in Israel's history.

The project – a high-tech network of sensors, barbed wire and cement walls – is Israel's new security barrier, the thing that Israeli citizens and politicians hope will save the country from the ravages of terrorism.

Mashiah, whose name translates roughly as "eternal messiah," is the man in charge of its construction.

International condemnation of Israel's decision to build a security fence inside the West Bank has been in the news for months. Scrutiny is sure to intensify ahead of a Feb. 23 hearing on the fence's legality at the International Court of Justice at The Hague.

But the fence's actual construction quietly has drawn the interest of a few foreign governments – for reasons having nothing to do with politics.

According to Mashiah, a number of countries – he would not identify them – have consulted Israel on the fence's technology and construction with an eye to similar projects at home.

Since Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's cabinet decided to embark on the project in July 2001, some 124 miles have been built to separate Israel from the West Bank.

At first, the barrier was to be 50 miles long. Then, citing the intensification of Palestinian terrorist attacks, the government said it would build a longer barrier to run from Beit Shean in the north to Arad in the Negev Desert.

Now the government is calling for a total of some 500 miles of fencing by the end of 2005, at an estimated cost of $4.15 million (US) a mile.

Mashiah distances himself from the politics of the fence and the controversial decisions behind its route, which bows into the West Bank in places to incorporate major Israeli cities and towns in the West Bank.

For now, Mashiah says, there is no choice but to build the fence.

"I believe in peace," he says, "but without the option for it, we need to defend our land."

Israel says it had no other choice to protect its citizens from the suicide bombings and other terrorist attacks that have marked the Palestinian intifadah, which is well into its fourth year. Nearly 1,000 Israelis have been killed in the intifadah, the overwhelming majority of them civilians.

Built as a "multilayered fence system" in Defence Ministry parlance, the barrier is designed effectively to separate Israel from the Palestinian population of the West Bank.

The structure – which has an average width of about 164 feet – is made up of several components. Among them is a stack of six coils of barbed wire, a ditch six-to-eight feet deep aimed at blocking vehicles from crossing and roads on either side of the fence so army patrols can pursue infiltrators.

At the centre of the system is what officials call "a metal intrusion detection fence" that features sensors to warn against incursions. If someone tries to cross, a warning is sounded.

The fence is not electrically charged, and the Defence Ministry maintains that no one can be harmed by touching it.

Strips of sand nearly 10 feet wide have been placed alongside the fence to detect intruders' footprints. There are watchtowers, cameras, heat sensors and touch detectors. Cameras are rigged for long-distance viewing and can detect whether or not suspected infiltrators are armed.

In a few places where the army says there is a risk of sniper fire on Israeli roads, concrete walls as high as 28 feet have been built. Concrete walls also are being used to separate some Palestinian villages that abut Jerusalem, such as Abu Dis, from the city proper.

Mashiah says there were no existing buildings or property destroyed along the fence's route, except for one building where the Palestinian owner had requested compensation. But, he adds, in the future there will be a "buffer zone" of 100 yards around the fence within which no buildings can be built taller than two stories.

About 20 per cent of the workers building the barrier are Palestinian, their jobs putting them at odds with many of their own people and their own political consciousness.

The fence is proving a humanitarian and practical hardship for Palestinians, separating some from farmland and jobs and others from relatives, schools and local hospitals.

Palestinian leaders denounce it as an Israeli land grab that is swallowing up land Palestinians want for a future state.

Some 10,000 Palestinians living in the so-called "seam zone," the area between the fence and the pre-1967 boundary known as the Green Line, will have to apply for permits to live in their homes. Visitors also need special permits.

In the West Bank Palestinian village of Masha, where a fence separates the village from neighbouring Jewish settlements, two Palestinian workers are putting up an Arabic-language danger sign warning residents not to approach the fence for risk of being shot.

One worker who identified himself only as Faras says he has spent the last year-and-a-half building the fence. He motions toward his home village, a collection of houses on an adjacent hillside.

"I don't have any opinions," he says. "I'm just doing this for the money. For me it's a good job."

Faras earns about $815 per month after taxes for the work – more than double the average salary of West Bank Palestinians. He agrees with friends and relatives who say the fence is not good for the Palestinian people, but says he has no alternative to working on the construction crew.

"I say, if you give me money, I will stop working here. That is the truth," he says. But "if there is no money, there is no life."

In an eastern Jerusalem neighbourhood that will be on the Palestinian side of the fence, another Palestinian construction worker offers a different view.

Mahmoud rumbles by in an orange earth mover, shuts off the roaring engine and tells a reporter he is in favour of the fence.

"I'm building the borders of the Palestinian state," he says. "How many UN resolutions have dealt with the issue? How many millions of Arabs have not improved the lives of the Palestinians?"

After a long period of unemployment, Mahmoud recently joined a fence construction crew made up entirely of Palestinians and Israeli Arabs. He is happy with his monthly salary.

Mashiah, a civil engineer by training, spent 23 years in the army working in construction. He returned to the military fold from his job as general manger of road construction at Solel Boneh, one of Israel's largest construction companies, to take on what he calls the "ultimate mega-project."

New developments in retroactive child and spousal support laws

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

The two questions most estranged spouses want answers to in this regard are:

1. Can a person deduct retroactive spousal support payments after he and his ex-wife have agreed to a retroactive increase?
2. How will an Ontario Court treat a primary caregiver parent who asks for a retroactive increase in child support from a payer if (a) the parent can't prove that she asked him to disclose his income to her in writing from year to year, and (b) there was nothing in their separation agreement or Court order obligjng him to reveal his income periodically?

Retroactive Spousal Support. The Income Tax Act allows a taxpayer to deduct spousal support payments from his income going back as far as the beginning of the calendar year before the year in which a Court order or separation agreement permitting such retroactive deductions was signed. For instance, let's say that separated spouses have signed a separation agreement or have become subject to a Court order on June 1, 2004 and the husband has been paying the wife $2000 monthly spousal support since January 1, 2003. If the agreement or Court order provides for monthly ("periodic") support going back that far (or earlier), then under the Income Tax Act the payments going back to January 1, 2003 will be considered "tax deductible" by the husband, and as taxable income to the wife.

Until recently, many lawyers and accountants assumed that divorcing clients could sign such agreements or consent to a Court order and even if the amounts had not actually been paid during the time period covered by the order, the payer spouse (usually the husband) could simply write one cheque to cover the "arrears" and still benefit from the tax deduction. At a recent Family Law lawyers gathering convened by the Ontario branch of the Canadian Bar Association, Professor James McLeod of London, Ontario shocked us all with the following clarification. Consultation with leading tax experts led him to conclude that according to the Income Tax Act, the monies had to be actually paid during the period of time covered by the order. A taxpayer could not simply write a cheque for "arrears" after signing such an agreement for retroactive support: if he tried to do so his payment would likely be disallowed.

People who make settlements based on such arrangements should be careful. Unless they have actually been making such periodic payments regularly prior to signing separation agreements or consenting to Court orders, they may not benefit from any retroactive spousal support payments they plan to deduct, even if they now pay them as "arrears."

Retroactive Child Support. Ever since the Child Support Guideline legislation became law, many lawyers have assumed that one only had to show a change in the payer's (usually the husband's) yearly income to obtain an increase in child support under the Federal Child Support Guideline legislation. Section 3 of the Guidelines has something called a "presumptive rule" that says that the amount of child support can only be determined with reference to a grid or table related to the payer's income. One did not have to show a "material change in circumstances", i.e. in the material needs of a child or of the recipient spouse's ability to pay. Well, guess what? The Ontario Court of Appeal seems to be saying that this is no longer the law: see Walsh v. Walsh, decided February 2, 2004 by Mr. Justice Laskin. The Court has decided that unless the receiving spouse has been asking each year for financial disclosure (i.e. for a copy of the payer's tax returns), then this receiving spouse cannot normally claim an increase in child support retroactively based on an increase in the payer's income over the past few years, unless she can demonstrate a compelling case for "need" of the children. Even then, she can only make such a claim after a trial, and not at something called a motion (a preliminary procedure which is a lot less expensive).

In Walsh, the wife had not made any yearly written requests for financial disclosure and after a few years found out that the children's father's income had increased dramatically from year to year. A lower Court increased the child support retroactively for each year and ordered a large payment to "catch up" on child support "arrears" based on his increased income in excess of $40,000.

Unfair transfer of wealth

However, the Court of Appeal found that there was no Court order, legislation or separation agreement that obligated the father to disclose his income every year. Unless the wife had requested the information about his income each year — which she hadn't — the Court of Appeal found that it would be an unfair "transfer of wealth" to surprise Mr. Walsh with a Court order that would compel him to pay child support for all these years retroactively unless there was evidence that the children needed the money. The lower Court thought that the Child Support Guideline legislation did not require such evidence because of this "presumptive rule", meaning the Guideline tables. However, Mr. Justice Laskin ruled that merely showing that Mr. Walsh's income had increased was not sufficient to warrant an order for retroactive payment.

As a result, every spouse receiving support should be careful to send, shortly after tax season each year (say July 1, since businessmen do not have to file until June 1), registered letters insisting on tax returns and other proof of income from the person responsible for paying child support under a separation agreement or Court order. If the payer's income has increased, the recipient can request increased child support or at least be in a legal position to request it from the Courts, without necessarily having to go through an expensive trial to demonstrate the needs of their child.

In addition, estranged spouses who receive child support, and especially their family law lawyers, should ensure that as a result of Walsh, they insist on inserting a clause in separation agreements and Court orders requiring parents paying child support to disclose their incomes yearly. This disclosure should be in the form of tax returns and any other documents required of them under the Child Support Guidelines. Otherwise, I fear that the Court of Appeal has now made matrimonial lawyers who fail to include such clauses appear negligent, since they make it more difficult for their clients later to claim retroactive child support.

The Court of Appeal's decision in Walsh is fraught with legal problems, especially since it appears to contradict section 3 of the Child Support Guidelines. However, if it is not appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, it remains the law of Ontario and will influence the Courts across the country.

Visit where Dante walked

By WOLF ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

Lake Garda, just west of Verona.

VERONA — Picture yourself having a drink in Verona's sunny Piazza delle Erbe and imagine that some 650 years ago, just steps from you, Dante Alighieri walked by.

The great Florentine poet had found refuge here in Verona when he was banned from his hometown. The lord of the city, Francesco della Scala, known as Cangrande, offered Dante his hospitality and became a great friend. The poet dedicated the third part of his Divine Comedy to him.

Picture, too, near your table, a statue of the lovely Madonna Verona crowning a small fountain built in 1368. Pigeons flutter around its base while Madonna Verona, originally a Roman lady, gracefully poses against a background of faded frescoes on the buildings surrounding the piazza. On market days, the piazza turns into a lively square, inundated by large market stalls and cries from vendors and children.

Piazza delle Erbe in Verona.

Passing the Arco della Costa, you enter an adjacent square – the "drawing room" of Verona, the stately Piazza dei Signori. Here the Palazzo del Comune, the Palazzo del Capitano and the jewel of the piazza, the Loggia del Consiglio, catch your eye. The facade of the Loggia, a fine Renaissance building, is adorned with striking Tuscan-style decorations. Marble statues of Roman dignitaries, such as Catullus, Plinus and Marcus, stand on its roofline, silent witnesses from the times when Verona, under Cangrande's rule, attracted poets, writers and sculptors.

In the centre of the square, a statue of Dante casts a stern eye on the pigeons and children playing below, while the Torre dei Lamberti rises into the summer sky. Begun in 1172 and finished in 1464, the tower is one of the town's landmarks. From its highest point, some 70 metres above the tiled rooftops, you can enjoy a sweeping view of Verona, the winding Adige River and the green hills beyond.

And there is the Shakespearean connection. Not far from here, in the Via Cappello, stands the 13th- century house believed to be the home of the Capulet family, immortalized by the playwright in Romeo and Juliet. In the courtyard, you can admire the balcony from which Juliet called out for her Romeo. And if you have forgotten the words spoken by the doomed lovers, there is a tablet in Italian and English.

Verona is a city of art. It is known not only for its civic architecture, but also for its churches, its outstanding basilica, San Zeno Maggiore, and its art museum, the Museo Castelvecchio. Within these building's walls are paintings by Peter Rubens, Tintoretto, Titian, Jacopo and Giovanni Bellini, Andrea Mantegna and Paolo Caliari, who was also known as Paolo Veronese, the name he took for his birthplace.

Verona is also an ancient city. The Romans, who called it Colonia Augusta Verona, left their legacy in the form of bridges, a triumphal arch, a theatre and an arena, which is surpassed in size only by the Colosseum in Rome. Today the arena is a venue for operas that are performed under the stars of the Italian sky.

No visit to Verona is complete without a day's tour around Lake Garda. Located some 20 kilometres to the west of the city, the lake is the largest in Italy. Praised since the time of antiquity, it is a pearl among the alpine lakes and appears a deep blue. Mountains surround it and its shores are awash with oleanders and lemon, orange, cypresses and palm trees. Farther inland, on its eastern shore, lie the vineyards of the Bardolino and Valpolicella, stretching across the Veronese hills.

The lake's western shoreline is composed of deep rocky inclines and picturesque villages with small harbours. This shore features the famous corniche, a road blasted from the steep rock with 70 tunnels and many bridges, which make a drive an experience, if not a pleasure. Great vistas open toward the opposite shore, and it is best to make the drive in the afternoon when the sun strikes the other side of the lake.

To start an excursion around the lake, the town of Sirmione would put you in the right mood. Its main attraction is the fairy-tale castle of the Scaligeri, complete with ramparts, moat and a drawbridge. Sirmione lies on top of a narrow peninsula that protrudes into the lake. There is plenty of parking before you enter the town and you can walk leisurely between ancient houses and narrow streets.

On top of the lake sits Riva del Garda, a picturesque old town near the harbour with a 12th-century castle called Rocca. From here, the road to Verona skirts the eastern shoreline, but the drive is less interesting, and at times the road can clog up with holiday traffic as the beaches there provide launching pads for windsurfers whose colourful sails dot the blue waters of the lake.

Nevertheless, if you go, you will pass a string of villages along the way, including Malcesine, from where you can take a cable car up to Monte Baldino, which has a height of 1,700 metres. Here again a castle of the Scaligeri dominates the town. It was painted by the German artist, poet and statesman Goethe, an admirer of Italy, who was consequently arrested for doing so and imprisoned here in 1786.

11-year-old soprano wunderkind to tour E. Europe with Oratorio Terezin

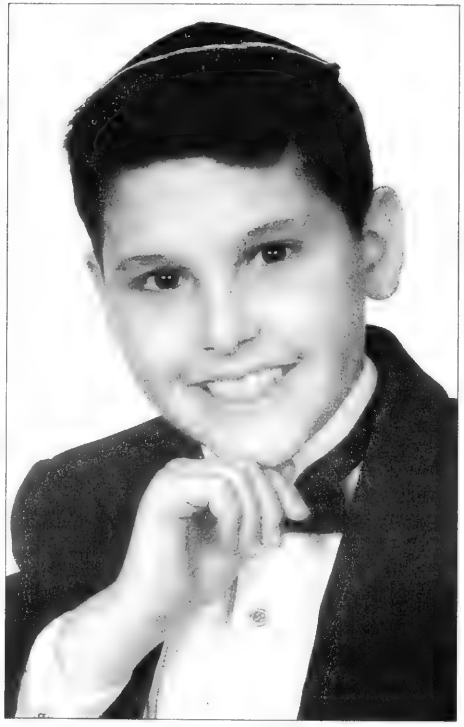
By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

After the Lodzer Centre's 50th anniversary cantorial concert last December, the featured singers chatted with audience members at a reception.

But one performer was the focus of particular attention, ranging from intense handshakes to gushings of "You were delightful!"

Indeed, cheek-pinching wouldn't have been out of place, since the surprise highlight of the concert was 11-year-old Jakie Young.

The soprano wunderkind, who has performed for audiences in Toronto and Hamilton, has been getting more and more attention of late. Most notably, Jakie sang in the world premiere last fall of Ruth Fazal's 31-piece Oratorio Terezin at the George Weston Recital Hall, playing the tender "butterfly" role.



Jakie Young

Audiences abroad will have a chance to hear Jakie when he and Oratorio Terezin tour eastern Europe next month and perform at halls in Vienna, Prague, Brno, Bratislava and Prague.

The son of Beth Torah Congregation's Cantor David Young says he appreciates his important role in the musical, which is dedicated to 15,000 children who were slaughtered at the Terezin concentration camp.

"It is my responsibility and my duty to act as both the physical and spiritual voice taken away from these children," he says in a VisionTV documentary on Oratorio Terezin.

In an interview at his home near Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue, the energetic Associated Hebrew Schools student leads me to his room upstairs, where he keeps his collection of Holocaust books.

"When I started to read about the Holocaust in Grade 3, it disturbed me greatly," says Jakie, now in Grade 6.

"Why should these people die because they're Jewish?"

His was so interested in the subject that he finished every Holocaust-related book in his school library a year ago.

In addition to poring over Holocaust books by such authors as Idu Vas and Carol Matas, his singing teacher says he trains his voice with the intensity of an Olympic athlete.

Elaine Overholt taught Richard Gere how to sing for the film Chicago, and she says Jakie has the same exercise regimen. From jaw and tongue-relaxation techniques to maximum resonance training, the routine is rigorous.

"Other kids are playing hockey after school and I go to opera-training camp," he says without regret.

The devotion to singing affects his lifestyle: he protects his voice by always wearing a hat and scarf and by staying indoors during wintertime recess.

The work is already paying off, judging by Overholt's compliments.

"His ear leads him to the proper places. His voice is very clear and focused," she says. "And he's not afraid to take chances. He's absolutely fearless."

That courage propelled Jakie onto the Beth Torah bimah at age six, when he first sang publicly on Kol Nidre night . A subsequent concert at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care fuelled his passion for performing, and he later joined the Shaarei Shomayim Choir and the Renanim Children's Chorus.

Last June, he sang a duet with Cantor Schneur Bielak at Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, and since then the cantorial concert requests have been pouring in. In June, he will be one of the featured performers at Shaar Shalom Synagogue's 30th anniversary concert.

Jakie's new nine-track CD features tender renditions of a number of prayers, including Yismichu, Adon Olam and Sim Shalom, all graced with harmonies he recorded over the main melodies. The discs, selling for $18 each, are a fundraiser for Beth Torah.

"It'd be real fun to be a part-time cantor," admits Jakie, adding that he would also like to be a geriatric doctor or a children's psychiatrist.

When he's not practising his Judaic repertoire, Jakie sings Broadway tunes or creates imaginary worlds with his expansive Lego set. He even designed a Lego concentration camp for Nazis because "they should get what they deserve," as he puts it.

He says his ideal post-secondary educational venue is Yeshiva University, which offers chazzanut courses.

His father says Jakie has truly followed in his vocal footsteps. David Young recalls a vacation in Cancun, Mexico, when Jakie was only 14 months old. While walking along the beach, David sang several notes, and Jakie sang them back to him in perfect pitch. Since then, the two have sung countless duets together, both at home and in shul.

"It's an absolute pleasure to hear Jakie sing," his father says, adding that some Beth Torah members even admit that they come to shul just to hear him.

Now that's going to be one bar mitzvah worth checking out.

"NAFTY" NAFTOLIN KOMEDY KABARET GOING STRONG IN ITS SECOND YEAR

Now in its second year, a once-a-month open-mike comedy hour at the Bernard Betel Centre attracts a steady stream of aspiring stand-up comics, says Ruth Cohen, the centre's manager of recreation and education who often warms up the crowd by delivering a brisk comic monologue liberally sprinkled with Yiddishisms.

Steady stream of aspiring stand-up comics

Named in honour of a Toronto rug salesman and natural comedian who died two years ago this month, the Morris "Nafty" Naftolin Komedy Kabaret fulfils a vital function by tapping into the funny bone of the Betel community, Cohen says.

"Seniors love to laugh at themselves. It's a way of setting aside their problems," she says. "Laughing is good for people. People are starting to realize that humour is therapeutic."

President for many years of his large family's cousin club, known as the United Families Organization or Agudas Hamispoche, Naftolin hosted many of its annual banquets, always with a joke or even a song at the ready. Last year, the 75-year-old organization decided to fund the comedy cabaret in his memory.

As many as 80 people turn up at the Betel Centre each month for the laughs and free refreshments. Everyone is welcome to attend, and amateur comedians and raconteurs are invited to "come and get your five minutes of fame on our stage."

The next Komedy Kabaret is Thursday Feb. 26, at 2:30 p.m. Free admission. Auditorium, Betel Centre, 1003 Steeles Ave. W. Ruth Cohen, 416-225-2112.

Names in the News: Former Montrealer Hershey Felder makes his British stage debut this month by bringing his acclaimed show George Gershwin Alone to London's Duchess Theatre. A former yeshiva bocher and a nephew of the renowned Rabbi Gedalia Felder of Toronto, the concert pianist has won the approval of the Gershwin family and has been touring with the show for several years now… New York State Governor George Pataki has issued an official pardon to the late comedian Lenny Bruce for his obscenity conviction stemming from a comedy routine at the Café A Go Go in Greenwich Village some 40 years ago… Ray Stark, son-in-law of Broadway legend Fanny Brice and creator of the play and movie Funny Girl, which catapulted Barbra Streisand to stardom, has died in Los Angeles at 88. Stark also produced and co-produced more than 250 films, including 11 scripts from Neil Simon… British writer Salman Rushdie and Tracy Chevalier, author of the bestselling Girl With A Pearl Earring, are among the headliners at this year's Jewish Book Week in London, England, commencing Feb. 28. Israeli scribes A. B. Yehoshua and Aharon Appelfeld are also on the roster.

Richmond Hill-based soprano plays Anne Frank

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

The Diary of Anne Frank, a one-woman opera by Russian Jewish composer Grigori Frid, has its Canadian premiere at Leah Posluns Theatre next month.

The mono-opera, which had its Russian premiere at the Moscow Composers' Union in 1972, depicts episodes in Anne Frank's life, using a libretto made up of excerpts from Anne's diary.

In 1978, Frid smuggled the score of Anne Frank to an American lawyer, who arranged a performance at the University of Syracuse. An English translation from the original Russian was produced last May at Temple Israel in New York City. Presented by Toronto's Tryptych Productions, The Diary of Anne Frank, in English, will be performed here on March 10 and 11.

Shoshana Friedman

Anne Frank, her family and four other people hid from the Nazis in the attic of an Amsterdam office building from 1942 to '44. While they were in hiding, Anne wrote a diary that has since been translated into 55 languages and sold some 20 million copies. She died at Bergen-Belsen. Her father, Otto, was the only family member to survive the Holocaust.

Soprano Shoshana Friedman, the Richmond Hill-based singer who performs The Diary of Anne Frank at Leah Posluns, says it's a challenge "to try to portray in one hour, with segments from her diary, the essence of who this remarkable young woman was."

In rehearsal, Friedman says, the focus was on subtleties of interpretation of the piece – to show a 13-year-old girl whose main concerns are school and boys and "how the course of events changes her to [make her] an introspective young woman."

The music of The Diary of Anne Frank, to be played by Sinfonia TrypTych under conductor William Shookhoff, has been described by the editor of the U.S.-based Opera Today as "advanced Shostakovich, including many clusters, free rhythms, and a bit of jazz."

Friedman is not sure about the jazz content of Frid's composition, although she does say that the music is edgy and has angular elements. She is accustomed to singing the music of Romantic composers and made her operatic debut in Chiary, Italy, in 1998, in the roles of Violetta in Verdi's La Traviata and Musetta in Puccini's La Bohème.

Initially, Friedman had some difficulty with the vocal demands of Anne Frank. "Once I was able to chew on it, it became more logical and easy to learn," she says, adding that despite its modernity the music is accessible and powerfully evokes the times.

Many people who are now in their 30s and 40s have never heard of Anne Frank, which Friedman finds sad and shocking. She sees the Tryptych production – the company hopes to tour the show across Canada – as a way to generate interest in Anne. "She is the embodiment of the Holocaust, of the frailty, the nobility and the triumph of the human spirit," Friedman says.

Israel was fed false information prior to Yom Kippur War, author says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Howard Blum's book on the Yom Kippur War, The Eve of Destruction (HarperCollins), breaks new ground.

Blum, an American investigative reporter, claims Israel was surprised by the outbreak of war on Oct. 6, 1973, having been lulled into complacency by an Egyptian double agent.

Israel assumed Egypt would not try to recapture the Sinai Peninsula unless it acquired long-range bombers and missiles and the Arab states established a war coalition.

Israel's strategy, known as "the concept," was formed following the 1967 Six Day War. In this readable book, Blum suggests that Egypt's double agent, referred to as the "in-law," fed Israel false information and thus contributed in large part to Israel's catastrophic failure of intelligence.

The in-law, whose real name Blum never reveals, contacted Israel in 1969 during the War of Attrition along the Suez Canal. The Mossad considered him an important catch. He was an Egyptian ambassador at large and his wife was the daughter of Egypt's president, Gamel Abdel Nasser.

In 1970, the in-law delivered two "incredible" documents, both of which became "the foundation" for Israel's long-term threat assessment of Egypt, its most formidable enemy.

The first document, a supposed transcript of a conversation between Nasser and members of the Soviet Union's general staff, clued Israel in to Egypt's strategic thinking.

The transcript quoted Nasser as saying he could not wage a successful war to free the Sinai unless Egypt acquired long-range Scud missiles to terrorize Israeli cities and fighter bombers to destroy Israel's fortified command centres. It also revealed that Moscow was unwilling to supply Cairo with that vital equipment.

The second document, a supposedly confidential 1972 letter written by Nasser's successor, Anwar Sadat, to Soviet president Leonid Brezhnev, reiterated Egypt's contention that an offensive against Israel would be impossible without both missiles and bombers and an Arab coalition.

As a result of this data, Israel developed "Ha'kontzeptia," the flawed strategy that cost Israel dearly in the first days of the Yom Kippur War.

According to Blum, Egypt's chief of staff, Saad el Shazly, played his hand brilliantly. He developed a plan for a limited war that envisaged an Egyptian army crossing of the Suez Canal. Shazly theorized – correctly, as it turned out – that Egyptian forces could protect themselves from Israeli counter strikes by not advancing beyond their surface-to-surface SAM missile shield. Egypt could then declare "victory" and force a land-for-peace agreement on Israel.

Book finds fault with media's pre-9/11 coverage

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Western media outlets have whitewashed terrorism and lulled the public into a complacency that made it easy for 9/11 to occur, says a Montreal author who analyzed 24 newspapers over a 10-year period, beginning with the first attack on New York's World Trade Center in 1993.

In his self-published Complicity: Terrorism in the News, Elliot Kramer charges that the mainstream media "suppressed awareness of terrorism throughout the last decade, thereby preventing the public from demanding action from the government against terrorism, since it was never perceived as an issue."

He argues that this is one of the main reasons the United States was unprepared for the catastrophic attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

But while his assertion that the press failed utterly over a decade to identify an Islamic fundamentalist campaign against America may be valid and demonstrable by facts, Kramer is less convincing in backing up his argument that the failure was deliberate. At the same time, he blames editors for sloppiness and wilfulness.

> United States was unprepared for the catastrophic attack

Kramer, a graduate of Georgetown University's national security studies program, is the former editor-in-chief of Dateline: Middle East, a student journal sponsored by the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research. His last book, A Time for Truth, was an indictment of the media's reporting of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

For his research on Complicity, Kramer examined 10 years of headlines related to terrorism in 24 papers from the time of the Feb. 26, 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center by Islamic extremists. He says he focused on headlines rather than stories because they have a greater impact and because they are written by the paper, as opposed to staff reporters or news services.

He chose a cross-section of American and Canadian dailies, as well as three European papers and, for contrast, the Jerusalem Post. His list included, from the United States, the New York Times, Atlanta Journal-Constitution, Boston Globe, Chicago Tribune, Seattle Times, Los Angeles Times, Washington Post, Dallas Morning News, San Francisco Chronicle, Denver Post, Louisville Courier-Journal, Miami Herald, USA Today, Mississippi's Jackson Clarion-Ledger, Montana's Great Falls Tribune; from Canada, the Toronto Star, Globe and Mail, Ottawa Citizen, Montreal Gazette, National Post; and, from Europe, the Guardian, London Times and Le Monde.

The total circulation of these papers is more than 15.9 million, he notes.

Complicity attempts to show that these papers virtually ignored Al Qaeda and other Islamic fundamentalists' enmity against the United States, dismissed Osama bin Laden before 9/11, despite a number of bombings of American targets, and they were soft on terrorism-linked states such as Syria, Saudi Arabia and Iran.

Kramer found that the press either downplayed attacks that killed only a few Americans at a time, usually abroad, or treated them as isolated incidents. The terrorists probably got the impression they could literally get away with murder, he says.

And he found little difference in coverage, regardless of the paper's political slant.

"The media's consistent omission of stories about terrorists, its steadfast refusal to label the bombers and murders as 'terrorists,' and its creative and dishonest presentations of the states and actors involved in proliferating terrorism, cements the conclusion that the press is complicit," he writes.

Kramer goes so far as to say readers are being "subjected to a silent campaign of censorship and revisionism" by the media, although his reasoning is vague. He even acknowledges that "nobody rational would think that editors are checking notes with their colleagues as they scurry to meet headline deadlines."

When it comes to coverage of terrorism against Israelis or Jews elsewhere, the record is even more egregious, he says.

"Coverage of the Jewish people, and in particular Israel, was abysmal and fraught with double standards."

As for the Jerusalem Post, Kramer found it to be the only paper that believed terrorism posed a critical problem to the West. However, even it did not identify bin Laden as a threat.

Among the North American papers, Kramer gave the highest marks to the National Post, founded in 1998.

"More often than any other daily, it focused on reporting what actually happened rather than on what it wanted to have happened."

Kramer does not find much difference in today's media coverage since 9/11.

"Despite fundamental changes occurring in the world, the media is holding on to a view that was dated and skewed in 1993 when the World Trade Center was first attacked by bin Laden. Ten years later, this rigid agenda of complicity continues to prosper in the pages of these newspapers."

Yet for all his attacks on the press, Kramer does not answer why newspapers should have a "political agenda" or justify his accusation that the publishers were partners in terrorist acts against their fellow citizens. It's also unlikely that security officials waited to see what was in the newspapers to decide how closely to monitor the terrorist threat.

Kramer says he wrote the book to encourage the public to question what it reads and to pressure the media to "correct the situation." The book includes a sample petition that can be sent to newspapers. He has also set up a follow-up website: www.elliotkramer.ca.

New solution for hypertension

By VERED FRECHTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Over half a million people in Israel suffer from high blood pressure, or hypertension – a very common illness. It damages the heart and the blood vessels, causing death and increased morbidity. Treatment is usually through drugs, but for patients with moderate hypertension, it's possible to reduce blood pressure without harming any organs by reducing salt consumption and increasing physical activity.

Now there is another way. Prof. Ehud Grossman, head of the department of internal medicine and the hypertension unit at the Sheba Medical Center in Tel Hashomer, tells of a new device developed in Israel that has proven to be effective in reducing blood pressure. The device, called RESPeRATE, whose aim is to help patients practice slow breathing, was developed by Israeli biophysicist Dr. Benny Gavish. It is composed of three parts: a belt, which is placed around the abdomen and measures the breathing rate by sensing the expansion and contraction of the abdomen; earphones, and the device itself.

The device senses the breathing rhythm and accordingly creates a musical model composed of an ascending and a descending note, which are sounded at intervals close to the inhalation and exhalation rates of the patient, but at a slower pace. The purpose is to slow the patient's rate of breathing while emphasizing a prolonging of the exhalation time. The breathing rate produced is up to six breaths a minute, which is much slower than the usual rate of eight-14 breaths a minute. It is difficult to achieve such a breathing rate without the guidance of a device.

RESPeRATE's activity has been analyzed in several clinical studies. The first study was conducted in Israel among 33 patients, some of whom received the device and the others who received a Walkman that played soft music. According to Grossman, the participants did not receive an explanation of how the device works, nor were they told that they had to adjust their rate of breathing to the sounds they heard. They were given a general explanation that the possibility of lowering blood pressure by listening to music was being tested.

The subjects used the device four to five times a week, for 10 minutes each time, over a period of eight weeks. A greater reduction in blood pressure was observed among the subjects who had received the device than among those who had received the placebo. Sixty per cent responded to the treatment with a reduction in blood pressure. Most continued the treatment.

Additional studies have also been conducted in Israel and in the United States. The results show that use of the device lowered systolic blood pressure (the top number, during heart contractions) by 12.1 mm mercury on the average, and the diastolic blood pressure (the bottom number, when the heart relaxes) by 6.1 mm mercury. There were no significant side effects. As a result, the device has been approved for use by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA), as well as in Israel, for the treatment of hypertension.

The operating mechanism of the device is not entirely clear. Grossman says earlier studies found that monitored breathing exercises can lead to a lowering of blood pressure, but in most of these studies, the positive clinical effect was attributed to the element of relaxation rather than to the element of breathing. The origin of this approach, says Grossman, was the attempt to introduce mystical philosophies into western medicine in the 1960s.

This approach, he says, ignores a great deal of information found in medical literature that shows the effect of slow, deep breaths on the heart and the blood vessels, preventing the development of high blood pressure. This effect was in fact looked at about 70 years ago, but the studies were abandoned and are not cited in the medical literature. Grossman says slow, deep breathing intensifies the sensitivity of the mechanism that monitors blood pressure, increases the change in heartbeat in accordance with activity, improves the blood flow in small blood vessels, reduces the peripheral resistance of the blood vessels and improves the return of venous blood to the heart.

These effects can be seen in breathing rates lower than 10 breaths a minute, and are most effective at a rate of about six breaths a minute. That is, in fact, the rate that characterizes breathing during meditation or prayer based on a mantra, says Grossman, but it can be achieved even without it – for example, through use of the device.

In the future, Grossman hopes the way RESPeRATE actually works will become clearer in additional studies. The device, which is already being marketed in the United States and Israel, does not replace existing methods of treatment but supplements them, he stresses.

New TN Association formed

The newly formed Trigeminal Neuralgia Association of Canada, with headquarters in Lethbridge, Alta., seeks patients, spouses, caregivers, and medical and health professionals to register with the association.

Trigeminal Neuralgia (TN) also known as tic douloureux, is an excruciating facial pain that tends to come and go in sudden shock-like attacks.

It is a chronic disorder of the trigeminal nerve (fifth cranial nerve), which is the largest of the body's 12 pairs of cranial nerves.

The trigeminal nerve has three branches that conduct sensation from the upper, middle and lower portions of the face, as well as the oral cavity, to the brain.

TN for some, may mean brief episodes of facial pain that will come out of the blue and disappear just as quickly.

For others, it will be relentless, lightning-like bolts of pain resulting in agony for the individual.

Whatever the situation, patients need to know that trigeminal neuralgia is a treatable disorder and one in which effective management, and in many cases long-term resolution, is attainable.

Although TN is not fatal, it may be a chronic problem, but effective medications and excellent neurosurgical procedures are an option.

The association's medical adviser, Dr. Anthony Kaufmann, will help establish a membership of Canadian medical, dental and other health-care professionals.

To register, send your name, address, postal code and e-mail address to: Trigeminal Neuralgia Association of Canada, 1514 Lakemount Blvd., Lethbridge, Alta., T1K 3K4 or to Marion at tnac@telus.net

EISEN, Milton E., MD. On Jan. 25, in New York City. Beloved husband of Mimi. Devoted father of Jon, Carolyn and Julia Lester, father-in-law of William Lester and Katherine Smith, and loving grandfather of Jim, Kate, Annie, Emily and the late Naomi Eisen. Dr. Eisen grew up in Toronto and obtained his MD from U. of T. in 1936. He settled in New York where he practised internal medicine for over 60 years. He was on staff at the Mount Sinai Hospital and chief of peripheral vascular diseases at two other hospitals. Throughout his career he worked in the battle against cigarette smoking. He was a pioneer in research on the adverse effects of smoking on health in the 1940's and 50's, and published his first paper in the Canadian Journal of Medicine. At age 70 he studied acupuncture and became proficient using it to curb smoking as well as to alleviate pain. Dr. Eisen maintained a close connection to Canada all his life.

Architect's grandiose vision died with him

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

If Louis I. Kahn's dream has been realized, there would be a new synagogue in the Jewish Quarter of Old Jerusalem that would have replaced the one destroyed by Jordan in the 1948 war.

His synagogue would have been impressive, looking over the Western Wall and towering over the Dome of the Rock.

But when Kahn died in 1974, bankrupt and unidentified in a New York City subway station, the vision died with him.

In My Architect, opening on Feb. 20, filmmaker Nathaniel Kahn, the illegitimate son of one of the most important architects of the second half of the 20th century, undertakes a five-year, worldwide journey to understand his long-dead father.

When the architect died, he left behind three families – one with his wife of many years, and two that were the product of long-term affairs. Nathaniel, a son of one of Kahn's mistresses, was 11 when his father died.

Even if you know nothing about architecture, let alone Kahn, you will find yourself engrossed in this well-made film, which has been nominated for an Academy Award in the best documentary category.

It's not so much a biography of Kahn as it is about Nathaniel's search to learn about his father, whom he only saw on rare occasions. In the process, Nathaniel takes us to the scenes of some of Kahn's most famous works, including the Salk Institute in California and what is quite possibly his masterpiece, the National Assembly Building of Bangladesh, which was completed after his death.

As an architect, Kahn was a late bloomer. Disenchanted with postwar modern architecture, it was only after a trip to Egypt and Europe that he found his calling. He returned with the idea of building modern buildings that had the feel and presence of ancient ruins.

By then, Kahn was over 50 and would only live about 20 more years.

His buildings are characterized by his use of open spaces and large round windows that make as much use of natural daylight as possible.

Celebrated architect Frank Gehry says, "My first works came out of reverence to Kahn."

One of Kahn 's biggest disappointments was the failure to get his Jerusalem project up and running.

Former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek worked on it with Kahn for seven years. Kahn's plan was not to tear down the existing ruins of the Hurva Synagogue, but to build his synagogue beside it.

"He wanted to unite the Jews of the world with a building," the cigar-smoking Kollek tells Nathaniel.

But politics interfered. Kahn was told his shul was too big and would interfere with the mosque.

"Nobody dared to take the plans of your father to completion," Kollek says.

In an interview in the desert, architect Moshe Safdie says, "When your father came here, he felt the Jews entrusted him to do this. He really wanted to do this."

Jerusalem's Old City would certainly look a lot different if the project was completed. As the Bangladesh government building – a castle-like structure that took 23 years to build – shows, Kahn's works, though few in number, are monuments to his grandiose vision.

Anne Frank to be performed for schools

"Her legacy lives in this book that she thought no one would read. It should be compulsory reading for every 15- and 16-year-old girl and boy in high school."

Friedman gives the first school performance of The Diary of Anne Frank on the afternoon of March 11, for an audience of some 400 Toronto high-school students. A Holocaust survivor will speak at the performance and the students will visit Toronto's Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

Evening performances of Anne Frank open with two pieces that are thematic tie-ins: Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings and Srul Irving Glick's song cycle, I Never Saw Another Butterfly, performed by contralto Nina Scott-Stoddard. The song cycle is based on poems written by children at the Terezin concentration camp.

Tryptych Productions, www.tryptych.org, presents The Diary of Anne Frank at Leah Posluns Theatre March 10 and 11, 8 p.m. For tickets, $36 or $18 for seniors and students, call Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111.

Mossad skeptical of warning

King Hussein of Jordan informed Israel's prime minister, Golda Meir, of the imminent attack. But the Mossad, being wed to "the concept," was skeptical of Jordan's warning. Israel also dismissed an American report that Syria planned a massive offensive to take back the Golan Heights.

Israel's director of military intelligence hewed to "the concept" even after Soviet families were suddenly pulled out of Egypt and Syria, a tipoff of a looming war.

Considering these developments seriously, Gen. David (Dado) Elazar issued a vital series of orders. Leaves of absence on the Egyptian and Syrian fronts were cancelled and both fronts were reinforced with more tanks. Even so, the Bar-Lev Line remained undermanned, patrolled by reservists rather than by regular paratroopers, and the Golan garrison was not up to strength.

Golda Meir

When Elazar learned that war would break out on both fronts within 13 hours, he asked for permission to launch a preemptive strike. His request was nixed by Meir and Moshe Dayan, the defence minister. They did not wish to anger the United States.

Dayan, who was exonerated by a postwar commission charged with studying the war, comes off as something of a blunderer in The Eve of Destruction.

Rattled by Syria's initial battlefield successes, Dayan issued orders to abandon the Golan. At the same time, he asked the commander of the air force to redouble his efforts on the Syrian front.

In the end, Israeli forces rallied, holding the Egyptians to their gains and pushing the Syrians off the territory on the Golan they had captured.

But the outcome of Yom Kippur War might have been far different had Israel jettisoned "the concept."

Israeli juniors coming for exhibitions, training

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israeli juniors (dark uniforms) relax with buddies from Montreal's Bialik high school after an exhibition game last year.

Israel's under-18 national junior hockey team will be in Toronto next week for a goodwill tour, a mini-training camp and a series of exhibition games against four select-level teams.

For the third year in a row, the Israeli juniors will set up camp in a number of Toronto rinks for on-ice drills to hone their skills. They will then embark on a trip to Sofia, Bulgaria, for the IIHF's Division 3 tournament beginning March 6.

The boys in blue will come to Toronto via New York City, where they will also play four exhibitions against local teams stocked with Jewish talent.

Moshe Eizenman, one of the organizers of the Israelis' Canadian visit, said "the idea for us was to help the hockey program in Israel and to let people in Canada see that life in Israel isn't always about fighting and that kids in Israel are normal kids interested in the same thing as kids in Canada. It shows the human face of Israel."

Altogether, 20 players and three coaches, most of whom reside in the northern towns of Ma'alot and Metulla, will make the journey to North America. Some will be making their third visit to Toronto.

For the young Israelis, who are responsible for paying their airfare to Canada, "it's a major endeavour, but it's a highlight of the year from a hockey point of view and in the response of the [local] community," Eizenman said.

"When the kids leave Toronto, they feel like they're 10 feet tall. And when they go back, they remember the community here."

In past years, the Jewish communities in Toronto and Montreal received the boys warmly. Finding billets has not been a problem, as many who had hosted the boys in previous years readily volunteered. A number of volunteer supporters have put together the money to finance their stay in Canada, Eizenman said.

As in past years, the team will visit Jewish day schools, – United Synagogue Day School, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Associated Hebrew Schools and the Toronto Heschel School – where they will meet kids from Grades 6 and 7 and answer their questions about life in Israel.

Ice time has been donated by the Canadian Ice Academy and Rinx, and the Israelis will face Select Midget teams from the Forest Hill Hockey Association, the Avenue Road Hockey Association and the Vaughan Hockey Association in exhibition games.

In addition, the public is invited to meet the team at an open skate at Forest Hill Arena.

Admission to the games is free and Eizenman said "we'd like the community to come. It's an opportunity to see the Israelis. We try to make it as much fun as possible."

Eizenman said Canadians have committed to providing $25,000 to support Israel's hockey program. In addition, players will receive new equipment.

While that sort of support has been given to Israeli hockey players for years, a more determined and organized approach to upgrading the country's hockey program has been launched.

Ambitious plans aim for 5,000 skaters in Israeli hockey league

The goal is to make Israel an international hockey power.

Ambitious indeed, but Montreal businessman Alan Maislin believes it can be done. As the Canadian-based chair of the Israeli Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF), he's already set in motion a dramatic upgrade of the country's hockey program.

"They needed help, and they asked us to help them," he said.

The proposal would dramatically transform Israel's modest hockey program and would include construction of a new rink in the Tel Aviv area. That part of the business plan is still a long way off, Maislin conceded, but the IIHF has already received several unsolicited offers from municipalities and universities about locating an arena on their land.

While that development remains on the back burner, the IIHF is working to expand and improve the country's minor hockey program. The goal is to increase the number of kids playing hockey to 500 to 600 from the current 60 to 70 within two years.

Coaches will be better trained, the Roger Neilson hockey school will resume operations in Metulla this summer and a 10-team hockey tournament with teams of Jewish players from North American communities is also on tap, Maislin said.

The sweetener for Jewish skaters is the chance to visit Israel, play hockey and get professional-level instruction from former NHL coaches Pierre Pagé and Jean Peron.

Pagé and Peron are only two of several high-profile names Maislin has recruited to the IIHF's hockey advisory board. Others include Pierre McGuire, Sherry Bassin, Ken Hitchcock, Jacques Demers and Scotty Bowman.

Maislin, who was part of an unsuccessful bid to purchase the Buffalo Sabres along with Bassin several years ago, said the IIHF's business plan will be modelled on the minor hockey program in the Czech Republic.

While Metulla's Canada Centre rink will remain the the national junior team's home base, Maislin hopes that with the construction of a rink near Tel Aviv (followed by one in Haifa), thousands of Israeli kids will take up the sport. His dream is for the sport to involve 5,000 youngsters – a number that's not farfetched considering there are already 95 inline skating teams in Israel playing ball hockey, "and they're all dying for ice," he said.

Maislin, whose family is in the trucking business in Montreal, said he will meet the current crop of juniors in New York, and will accompany them to Toronto. His list of contacts is so extensive that he was able to entice former New York Rangers star Rod Gilbert to help increase the team's profile during its New York visit. The New York Islanders, for their part, are hosting the team at one of their games.

Maislin said the Israeli team will visit Los Angeles and Toronto next year, and he hopes to bring them to other cities with large Jewish communities.

In Toronto, meanwhile, the juniors' schedule will see them play the Forest Hill Selects at Forest Hill Arena on Thursday, Feb. 26, at 9 p.m.; the Avenue Road Midgets at Carnegie Arena on Friday, Feb. 27, at 3 p.m.; Forest Hill at Forest Hill on Saturday, Feb. 28, at 6 p.m.; and the Vaughan Selects at Vaughan Sports Village on Sunday, Feb. 29, at 11:15 a.m.

The public skate with the team will be at Forest Hill Arena on Sunday, Feb. 29, from 3 to 4 p.m.

For more information, Eizenman can be reached at 416-633-4507.

PURIM PRALINES

1/2 cup light brown sugar
2 tblsps. corn syrup
2 tblsps. water
5-3/4 oz. can evaporated milk
1/4 tsp. salt
2 cups pecan halves
1/4 cup margarine

Pour sugar into heavy-bottom pot. Stir in corn syrup, water and evaporated milk. Boil over medium heat; stir in salt.

After boiling 1 minute, stir in pecan halves and lower heat a little. Stir constantly, till candy reaches soft-ball stage (234°F). Remove from heat.

While candy is resting, set out parchment paper. When candy has cooled slightly, stir in margarine and drop by tablespoon onto parchment paper.

By MIRIAM PORTER

If someone told me a year ago that an Orthodox rabbi would be in my apartment, I would have thought they must have me confused with somebody else. Yet there he was on a recent Thursday evening, standing in my kitchen. In front of us were two huge metal pots I could barely lift and a strange looking bag of "kashering tools."

My rabbi and his wife have become good friends of mine and I have been fortunate enough to enjoy many Shabbat meals in their kitchen. We are all 30-somethings at different stages of our lives.

The couple is blessed with five amazing children, while my only dependants have fur, four legs and a tail. The rabbi and his wife have kept a kosher home their whole life and my journey is just starting now.

I have been learning and growing as a Jewish woman over the past year. The mitzvah of kashering my kitchen and deciding to purchase kosher food was something I really wanted to do. I was beginning to read and understand the Torah and Halachah (Jewish law) and I wanted to apply it to my own life. A rebbitzen once said to me, "When a person koshers their home, the light of God shines in and then goes out to the entire world." I like to think that is true.

When I told my friends about my new plan, some of their responses – which were said as kindly as possible – were: "You have lost your mind," "You are just bored" and "That is so weird." After some very late night telephone conversations, they came to respect my decision, even if they do not necessarily agree. I can see how they might see it as strange, but we decided to each practise what we believe in to the best of our ability.

I knew I was doing the right thing as my rabbi explained the extensive kashrut process while he dipped my dishes, glasses and silverware into the pot of boiling water with a long pair of metal tongs. I watched as one by one my items became kosher.

The following day, the above items went with my rabbi to the mikvah, while the plastic ones all went back to their home in my cupboard and I went grocery shopping. I was excited to prepare my first kosher meal.

One day, if you happen to be wandering around the downtown Toronto area and see a mystical glow, don't be alarmed. It might be the light coming from my kosher apartment.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 10 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 24, 2004 at Beth Emeth Synagogue. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m. This year Ines Di Santo will be presenting their 2004 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centre-pieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

It's An Occasion, so make it special

Raizelle Serebrowski has owned and operated It's an Occasion Catering & Gourmet Foods for five years. Her experience goes back further, though; and her love of food preparation goes back as far as she can remember. Many of the recipes she teaches her staff today, are long-standing personal favourites.

A former teacher of religious studies, Serebrowski catered her four sons' bar mitzvahs for fun. Her friends urged her to make catering a business. She did, privately at first; then in 1998, she founded It's an Occasion.

Serebrowski is proud of the feedback she gets from many of her clients. "We get a lot of unsolicited thank-you notes," she says. Most of her business comes either from word of mouth, or from people who were guests at an event she catered.

Because It's an Occasion is not a huge company, Serebrowski is able to maintain that personal touch that is missing from the larger companies. "Our good name keeps our plate full," Serebrowski says.

At It's an Occasion, quality ingredients, preparation and personal service are standard fare. "I don't just want to meet your expectations," Serebrowski states: "I want to surpass them."

Until recently, It's an Occasion was only dairy and vegetarian. But now, through B'nai Torah, they are able to cater meat dishes as well. While they still have their 596 Marlee location; the B'nai Torah social hall is available for rental.

There's no kind of catering It's an Occasion doesn't do. You name it, they do it: Weddings, bar or bat mitzvahs, shivah meals, etc. And you can order in bulk. They will work at either of their two locations, in your home, or at other venues. And they will look after other aspects of your event, like wait staff and rentals.

It's an Occasion offers a chocolate fountain for kosher events; and they often supply other kosher caterers with sweet tables. They issue new menus four times a year; but what they offer is too diverse to encompass in a few pages. They will also customize a menu for you.

Make your event special: choose It's an Occasion Catering & Gourmet Foods. Call Raizelle Serebrowski for an appointment, at 416-785-0996; or the B'nai Torah synagogue office at 416-226-3700.

I couldn't stop eating. I dieted, but once I stopped, I gained my weight back plus more.

With hypnosis I lost an average of 10 lbs. a month, 49 lbs. in all. I've thrown out my fat clothes. I have not been paid to write this. I believe in hypnosis. It's given me my life back."

Marina Carrott regains wedding day form

My weight was increasing with each passing year. I was no longer slim and trim. I looked shapeless and stout. Today I weigh 128 lbs., exactly what I weighed on my wedding day 19 years ago. I never felt as if I was on a diet; I never felt deprived."

Lisa Bliss loses 30 pounds effortlessly

I tried diet pills. I tried Weight Watchers and low-cal foods. I never stuck to anything.

With Positive Changes I dropped 30 lbs. without any effort whatsoever! There is no dollar amount I can put on the benefits I have gained from the program."

Life insurers reject Israel travellers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Planning to take out life insurance and visit Israel? Well, pick one or the other, because based on the current practices of most Canadian insurers, you're not likely to be able to do both.

Over the past few years, financial advisor David Brown has seen insurer after insurer deny life insurance coverage to applicants who indicate they are planning to visit Israel.

"It's turned out to be a serious problem," Brown said. "Ninety-nine per cent won't write a contract."

Brown, a financial advisor at Al G. Brown & Associates, a family firm in the financial services industry, said many of his clients are Jewish and a substantial number visit Israel regularly, often several times a year.

"My biggest concern is that people are not able to protect themselves adequately because life insurance companies are not issuing the insurance… I think that's a big problem."

Brown believes large re-insurance companies based in Europe have determined that even casual travel to Israel is high risk due to the country's security situation. As a result, they will not reinsure policies for those who travel there. These companies, such as Munich Reinsurance and Swiss Reinsurance, are larger than most Canadian insurance companies combined.

"They're really the ones calling the shots. But they don't deal with the public," Brown said.

While domestic insurance companies such as Canada Life or RBC Insurance write policies, they in turn seek insurance coverage from reinsurers to reduce their risk. Generally, these local companies pay out part of the coverage while the reinsurers are responsible for the bulk of the claim. Brown estimates that 80 to 90 per cent of insurance policies are reinsured.

The News In Brief

Canada

Anti-Semitism Meeting

MONTREAL — A world conference on the "Global Dimensions of Contemporary Anti-Semitism," put on by the Quebec-Israel Committee and the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research, will be held in Montreal March 14 to 16. It will feature scholars and Jewish leaders such as author Daniel Goldhagen, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, Prof. Ruth Wisse and columnist Margaret Wente.

Agreement Signed

TORONTO — Representatives of B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) met earlier this month to sign a protocol establishing the relationship between the two advocacy groups. They said it will respect diversity of opinion and approach and will lead to co-ordination of both domestic and Israel-related advocacy between B'nai Brith and CIJA, which was formed last year by United Israel Appeal Federations Canada to co-ordinate the activities of Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee and National Jewish Campus Life.

Record UJA Haul

EDMONTON — Edmonton's Jewish community has raised a record $795,000 in its 2003 United Jewish Appeal campaign, besting its $700,000 goal by 13.5 per cent and 2002's total of $672,000 by 22 per cent, the Jewish Federation of Edmonton reported.

World

Rabbis Back Fence

JERUSALEM — Conservative rabbis from around the world passed a motion supporting Israel's West Bank security barrier by a large majority at the close of their movement's yearly Rabbinical Assembly Feb. 12. The fence was one of the most controversial agenda items, and a revised motion passed after a debate over language. It stressed Israel's right to self defence, but said Israel should do all it can to "avoid unnecessary hardships to innocent Palestinians" and to maintain its "Jewish and democratic character."

Robertson Gets Award

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Israeli Tourism Minister Benny Elon honoured Rev. Pat Robertson last week for advocating travel to Israel. Elon gave Robertson, founder of the Christian Broadcasting Network, an award at the National Religious Broadcasters' convention. Muslim leaders complained about the award, saying Robertson incites hate against Islam.

*Passion*ate Pleas

ROME — Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, wants the Vatican to take a stand on Mel Gibson's controversial film on Jesus. Foxman met with Vatican officials last week and urged them to tell bishops around the world to inform Catholics that The Passion of the Christ is Gibson's interpretation of the Gospels and not a factual record. The film opened this week. In an interview with Diane Sawyer on the ABC News show Primetime Special Edition, Gibson denied he is anti-Semitic and said the film does not blame Jews for Jesus' crucifixion. He said it echoes his belief "we all" are responsible for the death of Jesus. "To be anti-Semitic is a sin," he said. "To be anti-Semitic is to be un-Christian, and I'm not."

Hate Speech Fine

CAPE TOWN — A South African man was awarded more than $500 (US) in damages in a hate speech case. When Donell Tarloff complained his car was not fixed correctly, he was met with anti-Jewish slurs, newspaper reports said. A judge ruled that even though the taunts came before a hate law went into effect, he was still eligible for damages.

Nazi Amnesty Opposed

ROME — The Simon Wiesenthal Center has joined Italian Jews in protesting amnesty calls for a Nazi war criminal. Erich Priebke, 90, filed an amnesty request last fall, and some want him released due to his age and ill health. In a letter to Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, the centre urged Italy "to take all necessary measures in order that justice not be aborted or hijacked for political agendas." Priebke got a life sentence for his role in a 1944 shooting massacre in which 335 men – 75 were Jews – died near Rome.

Degrees Restored

BERLIN — The Hanover School of Veterinary Medicine veterinary school last week posthumously restored degrees the Nazis stripped from two Jews. It restored the degrees to the families of Hermann Cussell and Paul Stern, who both fled Nazi Germany. Cussell settled in what is now Israel. Stern went to Argentina.

Let My Boss Go

MOSCOW — A former Russian Jewish leader said last week he would cede his shares in the Yukos oil company to the Kremlin if the firm's president is freed. "Let my people go," Leonid Nevzlin said in Israel, where he fled when the case against Yukos arose last year. Firm founder Mikhail Khodorkovsky is facing fraud and tax evasion charges, along with shareholder Platon Lebedev. Yukos' security chief Aleksei Pichugin faces murder charges. The Kremlin responded with more charges against Lebedev.

Jewish groups angered by MP's comments

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

National Jewish organizations have lashed out at a backbench Liberal MP for calling Israel's security barrier an "atrocity" and equating it with the building of concentration camps. But one of them – the Canada-Israel Committee – sees the uproar as a chance to "educate" the lawmaker about Israel.

"Instead of chastising" London MP Pat O'Brien "and going for the jugular, we are trying to reach out," said CIC spokesman David Cooper. "We're hoping to sit down and educate him about the situation."

Cooper said the CIC has sent out feelers to some Liberal MPs on ways in which O'Brien can be convinced that Israel's controversial security fence is needed to thwart terror.

O'Brien "has not taken a great interest in the Middle East in the past and we suspect his knowledge is not that strong," said Cooper. "This is an opportunity to educate him on the situation."

O'Brien says fence 'further reduces' territories to concentration camps

In a routine member's statement Feb. 17 in the House of Commons, O'Brien said he recognizes "that Israel is within its rights to construct a security barrier on its own territory. However, the Sharon government is constructing the provocative security wall on territories occupied by Israel in direct and deliberate contravention of international law.

"Again today, I join my voice to that chorus of voices, including many Israeli citizens and security experts, who are demanding that the Sharon government stop its unilateral and counter-productive action," said O'Brien, a former chairperson of the Commons' defence committee.

He continued: "This wall denies basic human rights to the Palestinian people and further reduces the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to the status of concentration camps. The deplorable impact on the daily lives of Palestinians is unconscionable. The Government of Canada must not just speak against this atrocity, it must take concrete action to impress on the Sharon government our grave concerns.

"It is neither anti-Israel nor anti-Semitic," he went on, "to criticize the inflammatory actions of the Sharon government. Like most Canadians, my hope is that Israel and its Arab neighbours will agree to coexist peacefully and build bridges of justice, not walls of desperation."

Despite the CIC's olive branch, CEO Shimon Fogel said O'Brien's remarks "reflect a complete lack of understanding of the rationale for the security barrier and appreciation of the constant threat posed to innocent Israelis."

The CIC, Fogel said, is especially troubled by O'Brien's "offensive rhetoric.

"Comparisons to concentration camps are not only odious, they reflect substantial ignorance of the nature of [the security fence]."

The CIC has "reached out" to O'Brien and several of his caucus colleagues "in the hope of engaging him in constructive discussion," he said.

The day after O'Brien's statement, Art Eggleton, the member for York Centre, rose to defend the fence.

"We have to remember the realities that have forced Israel to build this protective barrier," Eggleton stated. "Israel has been targeted by an unprecedented campaign of terror that to date involves 136 suicide bombings, resulting in 925 fatalities and more than 6,100 people injured. The Palestinian Authority chooses not to stop this strategy of terror. This context is missing from the member's statement.

Burgeoning Israeli literary genre

From the editor's desk

The people of the Book in the land of the Book read, write and publish a great many written works, journals, newspapers and magazines on limitless subjects and in scores of languages.

In every city and town each Friday afternoon in Israel, observant and non-observant people alike generally rush to arrive home before Shabbat.

The parcels they carry into the house, as they hurry to shed the week of work, almost always include a bundle of flowers and a packet of one or two Sunday New York Times-sized newspapers and other assorted reading materials.

Israelis love to read.

Creative writing of all genres flourishes there like the tall scented pine trees in the hills around Jerusalem. One of the genres that has taken root in Israel relatively recently is the murder mystery.

Without the literary traditions of, for example, a Leslie Charteris or an Agatha Christie in Great Britain, or a Dashiell Hammett or a Ray Chandler in the United States, Israeli mystery writers began to assert themselves with greater assurance and frequency only in the mid-1980s.

Perhaps it took that long before a generation of Israeli writers arose who felt it acceptable to capture their young country's social and criminal pathologies in the pages of their novels.

But the mystery novel in Israel is now very popular. As critic George Demko recently observed, "The Israeli mystery is very well-developed… It has become a distinctive form of literary work with a tendency to broaden the genre and expand its boundaries to focus on character and theme development. Most mystery writers employ the genre as a very sensitive mirror to reflect social, political and demographic strains in the country."

The cadre of Israeli mystery writers is very talented. It includes writers such as Shulamit Lapid, Ora Shem-Or, Robert Rosenberg and Ram Oren, to name a few. But most of the writers have not been translated into English.

Perhaps the most famous of Israel's mystery writers is Batya Gur. Gur lives in Jerusalem where she is a literary critic for the daily Ha'aretz, one of Israel's leading newspapers.

She has written four police mysteries, all of which have been translated into English. The most recent of her works is Murder Duet: a Musical Case translated by Dalya Bilu (Harper Collins, 1999). Her three previous works are The Saturday Morning Murder: A Psychoanalytic Case (Harper Collins, 1988); Murder on a Kibbutz: A Communal Case (Harper Collins, 1994); and Literary Murder: A Critical Case (Harper Perennial, 1994).

The forensic hero of her mysteries is a middle-aged Jerusalem detective named Michael Ohayon. No Sherlock Holmes, Simon Templar, Mike Hammer or Columbo, Ohayon is unique: Israeli, a Sephardi Jerusalemite, a charming, cerebral and mildly brooding music aficionado who is self-conscious, yet superbly intuitive and analytical.

Of course we are meant to see, and we do see, many aspects of ourselves reflected in Ohayon's myriad vulnerabilities.

One of the special pleasures of reading Gur's mysteries is to be able to revel in their setting. She is a master in evoking the many sensory delights and images of Israel. Music Duet is set in Jerusalem, which brings the reader its own rewards.

The mystery unfolds and unwinds in the high-brow world of classical music.

Through a set of bizarre circumstances, Ohayon meets one of his neighbours, single mother Nita van Gelden, an attractive, troubled cellist who is part of an extended family of internationally renowned musicians. When a member of her family is murdered, Ohayon becomes involved in the investigation. But his friendship with van Gelden places him in a conflicted situation that compromises his customary cool, refined professional detachment, if not his judgment as well.

This is no crash-and-burn, high octane police story. Rather, it is an elegantly paced mystery that canvasses the damaging self-doubts and dark corners of the human psyche.

Gur's talent is especially rich in capturing the psychological nuances of the troubled mind. But Murder Duet gives the reader more than an education in forensic psychology. It also teaches the reader about the world of music, musicians and composers.

The murder is about music and reaches its crescendo because of music. Before she solves the central mystery, Gur takes the reader into a graduate school-level seminar on music structure and history.

Music Duet is an entertaining and informative read. It is also a good introduction, for those who need it, into the world of Israeli murder mystery writing.

Temple Sinai rabbi to officiate at gay marriages

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As a mainstream Reform rabbi in Toronto, Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai Congregation says he is not breaking ground with his recent decision to officiate at same-sex marriages.

But as spiritual leader of the city's second-largest Reform congregation, with 1,750 families, he has taken a very public step by announcing his decision in the current synagogue bulletin, as well as on the temple's website. The first wedding is scheduled to take place this summer.

According to Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, the first Jewish same-sex ceremony in the Toronto area dates back more than two years.

There has been little fanfare about them, or about which rabbis perform such ceremonies. The Canadian Coalition of Liberal Rabbis for Same Sex Marriages – a Canada-wide group of 25 Reform and Reconstructionist rabbis chaired by Rabbi Debra Landsberg of Temple Emanu-El – "protects the autonomy" of individual rabbis and congregations, explained Joanne Cohen, the coalition's co-ordinator.

Membership in the coalition, which presented a factum to the Ontario Court of Appeal in support of same-sex marriage last year, does not imply that a rabbi officiates at same-sex marriages, Cohen added.

Since last June's ruling making same-sex marriage legal in Ontario, more than 7,350 same-sex couples have been married in Toronto, said Cohen. She does not know how many of them were wed in Jewish ceremonies.

Last month, Rabbi Lawrence Englander of Mississauga's Solel Congregation also told the membership that he would be performing same-sex marriages. His first ceremony is scheduled for the fall.

The Reform movement supports equal rights for gays and lesbians on all levels, said Rabbi Sobel, but whether or not to officiate at a same-sex marriage is left to the discretion of each rabbi. In the Toronto area, Rabbi Sobel noted, Reform rabbis have agreed as a group not to perform interfaith marriages.

First wedding ceremony to take place this summer

At least two Reform congregations in the Toronto – Holy Blossom Temple with 2,500 member families, and Thornhill's Temple Har Zion, which has a membership of 600 – do not offer same-sex marriages.

The move at Temple Sinai was the result of an eight-month-long investigative and discussion process, sparked by three same-sex couples who belong to the congregation.

For Rabbi Dolgin, it was a "very" tough decision. "There have been months of consultation, classes taught, and discussions with individuals, our pulpit and services committee and our temple board."

People in the congregation "generally have been supportive of me making that decision," he said, adding that "as with any community, individuals have mixed feelings."

Rabbi Dolgin characterizes his congregation as "traditional Reform," based on such things as its use of Hebrew, strong support for Israel, and expectation of a get when a marriage breaks up.

"My desire is to engage the tradition in a meaningful way and to help our members live a full and meaningful Jewish life," said Rabbi Dolgin. The couples he has spoken to "are trying to live a full life as Jews in the context of their circumstances."

Rabbi Englander, who was recently named a member of the Order of Canada for social action, said that everything he's seen in gay couples who want to get married would fulfil the criteria for Jewish marriage, including that the marriage be between two Jews; that the couple have an exclusive, loving relationship; and they intend to create a Jewish home and raise any children in the Jewish tradition.

Solel is currently discussing whether or not the ceremonies could take place in the synagogue, he said.

When Rabbi Englander was studying to be ordained more than 30 years ago, same-sex marriage wasn't even on his radar screen, he said. "But to me that's one of the beautiful things about Reform Judaism. We can look at both tradition and change at the same time. This is a beautiful example of that."

His own attitudes started to change about 17 years ago when he heard from a young gay member who felt he didn't have a place in the congregation.

At the time, Rabbi Englander considered homosexuality to be against Jewish tradition, but said he was "always willing to learn." A meeting between the two sparked a long-term process of study and personal reflection for the rabbi.

Rabbi Dolgin and Rabbi Englander both belong to the Toronto Board of Rabbis, a multi-denominational umbrella group. The board does not take a stance on same-sex marriages because there is "no possibility of getting consensus," said its president, Rabbi Martin Berman of Shaar Shalom Congregation, a traditional Conservative synagogue.

The Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region – representing the province's Conservative rabbis – has a policy of not performing same-sex marriages, said immediate past president Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, of Beth Tzedec Congregation. "Part of the definition of a Jewish marriage is heterosexual," he said.

Rabbi Dovid Schochet, chair of Toronto's Vaad Harabonim, the city's Orthodox rabbinical body, said that "even many of the gentiles recognize that [same-sex marriage] is absurd. It's a chillul HaShem [desecration of God's name]. It's a disgrace."

If Reform rabbis "completely remove themselves from Judaism" by performing such marriages, he said, "what tradition there is, will not be recognizable."

Goldberg family plans Purim campaign for Zaka

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Shortly after the number 19 bus was blown up last month by a suicide bomber in one of West Jerusalem's narrow streets, members of Zaka, Israel's Disaster Victims Identification organization, arrived on the scene.

Although ZAKA personnel have become somewhat inured to gruesome terrorism attacks, this one was particularly bloody.

ZAKA could not save Canadian-born Yechezkel (Chezi) Goldberg, who was one of 11 passengers killed in the blast. But Goldberg's family, who lives here, remains intensely grateful for their efforts to help the injured and the dignified way they treated the human remains.

As a mark of support, the family is promoting a fundraising campaign for ZAKA that coincides with the holiday of Purim, which falls on March 7 this year.

The family is encouraging the purchase of Purim greeting cards to be sent to friends and family in lieu of mishloach manot (the sending of gifts), said Chavi Goldberg, who is married to Yechezkel's brother, Chaim.

"I just thought it is a way of showing thanks for what these people do, the care they take of the remains of the body and the care they take of the injured," she said.

"They literally give of their lives to care in a most sympathetic and professional way for people who are attacked in these tragedies."

Goldberg believes the festival of Purim lends itself to an effort that would support ZAKA. "It's a time of making human connections. Purim is a time of renewing friendships," she said.

Giving gifts of food to friends and donations to charity are holiday traditions, so sending a greeting card to a friend renews that contact while at the same time it supports a worthwhile charity, she said.

Goldberg said supporting an organization such as ZAKA is something that would have made sense to her late brother-in-law, who was a social worker who provided emotional and spiritual support to terror victims.

"He had been in some locations close to attacks. He saw up front what they [ZAKA] do. He was very touched by any kind of caring. He was involved with victims' families. He was one of those who helped victims and victims' families after an attack.

"So, in a way, they were in the same job."

Freelance journalist Marshall Shapiro, ZAKA's representative in Canada, said 30,000 Purim greeting cards have been printed. They are selling for $15 for a package of six.

Businesses in the Jewish community are being asked to either sell the cards or provide order forms.

All funds raised will go directly to ZAKA, a 600-member volunteer organization that is often the first to arrive on the scene after an attack. After administering first aid, the group's personnel – recognizable by their signature fluorescent green vests – begin the grim task of collecting body parts for proper burial.

Shapiro said the funds will be used to purchase medical supplies, body bags and motorcycles, which help volunteers get to terrorism scenes quickly.

Over the past two years, ZAKA has raised about $100,000 from Canadian contributors, he said.

Bone marrow clinic planned to help NY child

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

More than a decade after thousands of Toronto Jews were tested as prospective bone marrow donors for Jay Feinberg of New Jersey, a call has gone out to the community to help find a match for a nine-year-old Jewish boy in New York suffering from leukemia.

A clinic will take place Sunday, March 14, from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., at Holy Blossom Temple (1950 Bathurst St.) to test as many people as possible in order to locate a bone marrow match for Matthew, who lives in Scarsdale, N.Y., and was diagnosed at age five with acute lymphomblastic leukemia (ALL).

It's the most common form of leukemia in children and Matthew's prognosis is good, says his uncle, Gordon Arbess, a physician at St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto.

Matthew has been undergoing chemotherapy for three years, but his disease relapsed in January and doctors feel his best chance lies with a bone marrow transplant.

And the best chance for a match or close match is from someone of Ashkenazi Jewish descent, Arbess said. Matthew's family is of Russian-Polish heritage.

Whereas donors had blood drawn for the Jay Feinberg drives, this time, a simple, non-invasive cheek swab will be conducted.

The problem, Arbess explains, is that swabs are expensive. Each one costs $100 (US) to analyze, and Matthew's family is hoping to conduct at least 50,000 tests.

So in addition to finding donors, the family is hoping to raise between $5 million and $7.5 million.

Meantime, Matthew's disease must go into remission before a transplant can be done. To add to the family's apprehension, Matthew has a very rare bone marrow type.

"He's an extremely positive, spunky kid," says Arbess. "He does mostly everything a nine-year-boy would do, but he gets tired very easily." Matthew has two siblings, Ethan, 7, and Sophia, 5.

Several clinics were conducted for Feinberg in Toronto in the early 1990s. The Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation was established in 1991 as a donor recruitment tool for the young New Jersey resident.

In the ensuing four years, the foundation launched an aggressive drive to recruit donors of eastern European Jewish ethnicity. Over 60,000 such donors were registered in the National Marrow Donor Program and in other registries in the United States, Canada, Israel and South Africa.

Matthew

However, from a current global donor pool of 8.5 million, fewer than 300,000 are of Ashkenazi descent.

In 1995, the very last donor tested turned out to be a match for Feinberg, and he was successfully transplanted in Seattle.

Gift of Life is associated with several worldwide bone marrow registries. Matthew's story can be found at www.giftoflife.org.

Has 'Arafatigue' started to take hold?

There have been numerous reports lately about the increasingly angry and pouting behaviour of Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat. Last week, for example, he publicly railed against his prime minister Ahmed Qureia for having apparently agreed to a European Union request that European funds to the PA be disbursed directly to PA officials whose salaries the EU funds pay, rather than into bank accounts controlled by Arafat.

His wrath splenetically vented, Arafat immediately countermanded Qureia's brief attempt at meaningful, independent decision-making. The president would allow no banking changes and no lessening of his total control over PA funds. In truth, however, Arafat's reflexive response may be too late to slow down the already diminishing deference he receives from foreign governments.

The U.S. administration turned its back on the Palestinian dictator in the summer of 2002, when President George W. Bush said he would no longer deal with Arafat, part of his new policy toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In addition, the United States has refused to underwrite any of the cost of maintaining the PA apparatus since the ambush and murder of three Americans in Gaza last October.

Now the EU is also beginning to show signs of "Arafatigue." French and EU authorities have recently launched an investigation into the spending habits of Arafat's wife, Suha, who lives a lavish life in Paris. Many investigators believe there is a trail of money to be uncovered from the aging dictator's remittances to Suha's bank in Paris back to Arafat in Ramallah and then on to a secret Swiss bank account.

Last month, in his typically Orwellian manner, Arafat told The Guardian that "time is running out for the two-state solution." He also blamed Israel for toppling Qureia's predecessor, Mahmoud Abbas. After reflecting on the resignation of his first prime minister and no doubt upon the hole it may have left in the Palestinian people's heart, he nevertheless was able to sufficiently compose himself to say: "They know they can't replace me. We are not in Afghanistan – we are proud of our democracy."

Indeed. Such is Arafat's democracy that most western foreign governments are refusing to do business with him. They know him to be corrupt and cruel, a man who has stolen hundreds of millions of dollars from his own people rather than build for them the schools, roads and hospitals that they so desperately need.

Much of the PA establishment itself has turned away from him, as evidenced by the petition that some 400 PA officials signed last week to protest the rampant corruption in Arafat's carefully constructed hierarchy.

Arafat appears to be trapped into an ever-receding corner. We must, therefore, take heed. For we know from the past that when the boundaries of that corner have started to close in on him, he has reached across its lines for the only tool of extrication he knows: terror.

Gibson's passion

According to Christian teachings, God sent Jesus to Earth to die for humanity's sins. If Jesus' death was divinely ordained, how can anyone, or any group, be guilty of his murder? Besides, without Jesus' death, there would be no Christianity.

The fact that after more than 2,000 years, so many so-called educated people are acting like medieval peasants over this matter shows how far they still have to go on the road to civilization. Incidentally, I hear that Mel Gibson has excommunicated the Pope for not being Catholic enough.

Gibson's true motivation

Regardless of what Mel Gibson, in his Feb. 16 interview on CTV News, claims was his true motivation for filming The Passion of The Christ, his bottom line, like any other movie producer, is to make a killing at the box office.

If Gibson was indeed so passionate about (re)discovering his salvation in Jesus, he could have acted in a more compassionate and humane fashion.

Instead, his movie, in which he dramatically portrays the Jews of that time as being vicious "Christ- killers," is sure to inflame the passions of many and, as if it wasn't already bad enough, continue to fan the flames of anti-Semitism throughout the world.

It is ironic that the film is about a man who preached about peace, love and brotherhood for all mankind.

Canada blew it

On Jan. 29, a homicidal maniac blew up a bus in Jerusalem that was carrying women, children and Canadian citizen Yechezkel Goldberg, father of seven and formerly of Toronto.

Canadian officials contacted the Goldberg family, offering the usual condolences, but that was as far as they were willing to go. Literally. Canada's Middle East policy or lack thereof prevented Ambassador Donald Sinclair from doing the right thing by paying a visit to the family. Is it possible that the Canadian government is not aware of the Jewish grieving process? Do they not know Jews sit shivah? Do they not understand that during the shivah week, Jews stay in their home to mourn the death of their loved ones? Do they not know that Jews do not choose to be mourners in "disputed" territories? There is nothing political about this. There are times when moral agendas supersede political agendas and this was clearly one of those times. Sinclair and Canada did not rise to the occasion, but rather chose to play the political card.

I only wish that Canada would extricate itself from this tiring lack of old-fashioned good manners. Sinclair and Canada had a golden opportunity to rise to an expected moral standard, but they blew it.

Anger at Canadian gov't rekindled

The Canadian government's refusal to make a visit to the Goldberg family as they mourn the loss of their son and brother, Yechezkel Goldberg, who was killed in a bus bombing in Jerusalem Jan. 29, has rekindled the pain we experienced from our government 15 years ago.

In July 1989, we were on sabbatical in Jerusalem from our positions as vice-principal and teacher at the Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in Winnipeg. We had a close relationship with the students of that year's graduating class who went to stay on kibbutz and to tour Israel for the final seven weeks of their Grade 12 studies.

One of our students, Fern Shauna Rykiss, of blessed memory, spent time in Tel Aviv visiting her family. On her way back to Jerusalem, a terrorist commandeered her bus and drove it off a cliff into a ravine, killing her and 15 other passengers.

Her classmates were in a state of shock. Being the adults in Israel with the closest connection to the students, we gathered them at our apartment in order to grieve together. We accompanied Fern's remains to Lod Airport where they were sent back to Winnipeg for burial. The day-and-a-half before the funeral was filled with much anguish and pain. A large group of students were consumed by grief and distress. The residents of our entire building joined together to provide comfort in one way or another. We asked the Canadian charge d'affaires to come and comfort the students, but he would not, as we lived in the Jerusalem suburb of Gilo, which is across the "Green Line." The Canadian government also refused to help us make transportation arrangements to the funeral from our apartment, where we were eulogizing and reminiscing about Fern.

The Canadian response precipitated in us a sense of abandonment, which eventually led to feelings of anger. At times of crisis and loss, we seek out comfort because comfort and support help mute the pain and confusion we feel, especially when the horror of the experience and loss is so profound. This comfort was not forthcoming from the Canadian government, and the lack of humanity that the charge d'affaires exhibited as he balked at the opportunity to help comfort a room of grieving teens and adults because of the location of our apartment was profoundly disappointing.

Meanwhile, the Israeli government sent buses to take the entire group to the funeral service and provided social workers and psychologists who were experts in dealing with crisis situations. We continue to be grateful for their sensitivity and compassion. There is nothing positive we can say about the response of the Canadian government. That day was one of the most traumatic moments of our lives and the sense of rejection and neglect we experienced from the Canadian government lingers in our memory.

Jews and Muslims in Canada today

By LEO DAVIDS

In May 2003, Statistics Canada released the religion counts from the 2001 census. It is now possible to review the number of Jews by religion and the number of Muslims, comparing the most recent totals with those found in earlier censuses to ascertain the population trends for these important minority religions in Canada. The count of Jews by ethnic origin is another matter that will not be dealt with here. The term "Jews" in this essay refers to adherents of the denomination. We will look at the national totals and the totals of Canada's three largest cities, as well as very briefly examine the Canadian immigration history of the two religious groups.

The 1971 census report on religious groups had no listing for Muslims. At that time, it was believed there were so few Muslims in Canada that they should simply be left in the "other" residual category. By 1981, there was a count for both Jews and Muslims. It showed a Muslim total of 98,160 and a Jewish count of 296,400, meaning that Jews were three times as numerous as Muslims in Canada.

By 1991, Canada's Jews numbered about 318, 000, while the Muslim count had more than doubled since the previous census to a total of 253,300. Canada's biggest city, Toronto, had 151,100 people reporting the Jewish religion, compared with just under 106,000 Muslims. Montreal was understandably smaller on both counts, with 96,700 Jews and 41,200 Muslims. Whereas Toronto and Montreal together contained the bulk of Canadian Jewry (78 per cent), the Muslim population was more dispersed across the country: Toronto and Montreal together had 147,200 Muslims in 1991 (58 per cent), with another 106,000 elsewhere in Canada.

The 2001 census revealed hardly any growth in Jewish numbers compared to 10 years earlier, but continued growth among Canada's Muslims, brought their total population to 579,640. The Jewish count in 2001 came to 330,000 nationally, with 164,500 in greater Toronto and a little under 89,000 in greater Montreal. Together, the two cities contained 77 per cent of all Canadian Jews. Vancouver contained another 17,300 Jews – just over five per cent more. Thus, the three biggest cities in Canada contained 82 per cent of the country's Jews, suggesting the powerful attraction of these centres to them.

Apparently, there is very little natural increase nowadays among Canadian Jews, except for within the Orthodox and haredi communities. The total increase between 1991 and 2001 was under four per cent. While there are still some Jewish immigrants coming to Canada, it appears that at the same time, deaths are more numerous than births among Canadian Jews, which suggests the national count for those of Jewish religion might never exceed 350,000. On the other hand, if Jewish immigration to Canada were to increase substantially, and/or the Orthodox population continued to increase for some decades, this "population ceiling" might be surpassed in the future.

Turning to the Muslim numbers for 2001, the national total of just under 580,000 was well over double the 1991 count, indicating very strong immigration of Muslims during the intervening decade and/or a very high birth rate. Indeed, immigrants to Canada during the past decade or two have come primarily from Asia rather than Europe, bringing millions to Canada from the Middle East, Pakistan and other non-Christian countries. Thus, there has been an ongoing build-up of Muslim and other religious groups in Canada's largest cities.

Specific information on immigration to Canada by each religious group fills in the picture here. Among all of Canada's 330,000 Jews in 2001, less than a third (101,400) were immigrants and 68.4 per cent of Jews were Canadian-born (or had Canadian-citizen parents, although the children were born elsewhere). Jews who had immigrated to Canada since the 1991 census numbered just 22,365 – 6.8 per cent of the total 2001 Jewish population. This suggests a little more than 2,000 Jews by religion had settled in Canada annually, quite a small number.

Moreover, Canadian Jewry had almost as many seniors (58,400) as young children (61,075) in 2001, and the over-65 group accounted for about 18 per cent of all Canadian Jews. The slight decline in Jewish seniors between 1991 and 2001 suggests that some elderly Jews leave Canada to retire in warmer climates.

The Canadian Muslim population, however, is predominantly immigrant and young. Its non-immigrant component (that is, Canadian-born) numbered 137,850 in 2001 – 24 per cent of all Canadian Muslims. But 275,850 Muslims immigrated to Canada since the 1991 census, constituting 48 per cent of all Canadian Muslims in 2001. Thus, close to half of today's Canadian Muslims arrived between 1991 and 2001. This population includes many young children, but few older people. Twenty-nine per cent of all Canada's Muslims in 2001 were below age 15, versus four per cent (21,225 individuals) who were 65 years or older.

Specifically, Toronto had 254,100 Muslims in 2001, compared to 100,200 in greater Montreal and a further 52,600 in greater Vancouver. Toronto and Montreal combined were home to 61 per cent of Canada's Muslims in 2001, with another nine per cent in Vancouver. So Canadian Muslims are somewhat less concentrated in the three biggest cities than Jews, with 70 per cent of the country's Muslims living there versus 82 per cent of the Jewish population living there.

About 40 per cent of Canada's Muslims are of purely Arabic ancestry, while an additional 20 per cent report Arabic and other ethnic ancestry ("multiple response" cases). That means the remainder of Canada's Muslims – another 40 per cent – have non-Arab ethnic origins such as Iranian, Pakistani or Turkish. (The Arabic category includes people from across North Africa or from the Middle East.) There are even 250 Muslims reporting Jewish ethnic ancestry, predominantly in multiple-response cases (Jewish and other origins).

If the immigration picture continues during this decade along the lines that we have seen during the 1990s, the Muslim total for Canada is likely to be in the one-million range by 2011.

Jews and Muslims are different in their racial composition as well as in their ethnic makeup. The Canadian census avoids the word "race," but counts "visible minorities" who are not of mainly European/white descent. In 2001, what is the overlap of Canadian Judaism and Islam with "visible minority" categories such as Chinese, South Asian or black?

Canada's Muslim community perceives itself as predominantly non-white – that is, as being a "visible minority." The 2001 census reports that 85.8 per cent (497,275 people) of Canadian Muslims fit into some "visible minority" grouping, such as South Asian (212,800 Muslims) and black (51,675). Most Chinese Canadians and Canadians of African descent are Christians, however.

Regarding adherents of the Jewish faith, 1.6 per cent of them (5,275 individuals) reported themselves in 2001 to be "visible minorities." That includes 750 Jews of Chinese race and 1,450 of African origin, besides other groups. Many of these must be adopted children, raised as Jews but looking, obviously, like their genetic ancestors.

Today, two years since census day 2001, we may wonder what has changed since then. It is very likely that Canada's Jewish population has remained close to where it was then, since our population was close to a no-growth plateau at the time. On the other hand, Canada's Muslims are in a high-growth situation, so by now their population total is close to (or more than) 700,000, fully twice as large as our current Jewish-by-religion population, although not quite so if we were to add ethnic Jews who say they have no religion, or say they are atheist or agnostic, as Canada's Jewish federations do.

Furthermore, Canada has tens of thousands of Christian and other immigrants from predominantly Muslim countries (such as Egypt, Turkey, Iraq and Iran) who are not part of the Muslim Canadian count but are ethnic Arabs or Turks who speak the same languages and interact with their Muslim brethren here. For instance, only 25 per cent of Canada's ethnic Egyptians are Muslim, as is the case for 30 per cent of Canada's Lebanese community. The majority of these ethnic groups reported belonging to a Christian denomination in 2001. However, 68 per cent of Canada's ethnic Iranians are Muslim, versus 32 per cent who are not.

Opinions

Acceptance of history is a key to peace

Time and again, we have seen Middle East peace initiatives flounder in a tangle of misplaced expectations. There are many causes for the perpetual deadlock and, while some may be reversible, others are so entrenched by attitude and circumstance that change seems unlikely.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

One important, though often overlooked, obstacle to peace seems to relate to the obvious disconnect between the Jewish perspective of Israel's history and the Palestinian interpretation of that very same history. I was reminded of this intriguing dissonance when I recently happened upon the newly revised edition of a book titled The Palestine-Israeli Conflict: A Beginner's Guide. Promoted as "the only book that allows both sides to be heard" this short, readable paperback opens with a Jewish perspective written by Rabbi Dan Cohn-Sherbok, professor of Judaism at the University of Wales. Another academic at the same university, Dawoud El-Alami, then provides the Palestinian perspective.

The authors do not adhere to a similar format, so it is difficult to judge whether they actually agree on any of the broader constructs in the current debate on Middle East peace. However, they do engage each other more directly in the book's final chapter, where differences in their opinions and styles of expression are plainly evident.

What is remarkable about the tone of their discourse is that while Rabbi Cohn-Sherbok succinctly describes a generally mainstream formula for Israeli-Palestinian coexistence, El-Alami resorts instead to the sort of accusatory and hurtful rhetoric that has become so characteristic of the anti-Israel lobby.

It struck me that his reference to Israel as an "apartheid state," his assertion that "the very concept of a Jewish state is the ultimate in discrimination" and his mention of the "Jenin massacre" as fact rather than fiction were not only deliberately provocative, but detracted from what I had assumed was meant to be a serious scholarly interchange.

And that's not all. Many of El-Alami's other comments were similarly contentious. He inferred, for example, that the Israelis had "colonized an inhabited land," and he implied that such apparent "colonization" could only have been achieved by "ethnic cleansing."

I began the book with the hope it would turn out to be a rational and informative exchange of ideas that might offer some new avenues for addressing important issues in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

But I finished it disappointed, all the more so because it served to reinforce, yet again, that unless the dismissal of Jewish aspirations ceases and unless the acceptance of Jewish history becomes part of the template for future negotiations, peace in the Middle East will remain elusive.

A man on a mission

During the first 57 years of Alan Maislin's life in Montreal, Israel barely existed for him. Sure, he was Jewish, and yes, he had been there once, but that was about it. For Maislin, as for many other Diaspora Jews, Israel was far removed, physically and emotionally.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Just over a year ago, that all changed. Suddenly, he's travelled to Israel four times and plans to be back here again this summer. He's in frequent phone and e-mail contact with Israelis and the country is constantly on his mind. This, thanks to a vision he has for Israel that many people believe is as improbable as a lasting Middle East peace.

Maislin's mission is to make Israel a world power in hockey. And he's putting his time and money where his mouth is.

"Israel has the potential to become a major competitor in international hockey," says Maislin, a passionate hockey player himself who last March became the chair of the Israel Ice Hockey Association. "My main goal is to see Israel competing against the top teams in the world."

It's a tall order, but Maislin is not easily deterred. He started by thoroughly studying the state of hockey in Israel. He interviewed virtually everyone who had been involved with the local hockey scene. Now, he's drawn up plans for a greatly expanded hockey program, consulted with professional hockey experts around the world and established a fundraising committee in North America. He's even attracted several former NHL team owners, general managers and coaches to his advisory board.

Hockey began in Israel about 15 years ago with the opening of a basic rink supported by a core group of hockey-starved former Canadians. Since then, with the influx of hockey-savvy Russian immigrants, the sport has slowly taken root, and today there is a five-team league, a junior national team and a senior team that competes in world championships. Still, with only one decent rink (the Canada Centre in the northern border town of Metulla) and two small, substandard facilities, Israel is ill-equipped to develop a large-scale hockey program.

Maislin intends to change all that. With funding from North America, he plans to build two new quality rinks, develop an ambitious youth program and strengthen the national teams through better training and coaching.

This enthusiastic Montrealer, whose family used to be part owners of the Montreal Canadiens, insists that Israelis have what it takes to become excellent players.

"Beyond raw talent, there's a basic ingredient that professional hockey players have that others don't, and that's mental toughness," says Maislin. "Certainly in Israel, mental toughness is inherent in the difficult reality that Israelis have to contend with every day."

Maislin has high hopes for hockey's future in Israel. With the confidence of any good entrepreneur, he rattles off facts to support his pitch: There are more than one million Russian immigrants who know the game, Israel has 95 registered in-line hockey teams, 45,000 pairs of roller skaters were sold in the country last year.

"If we raise the awareness of ice hockey, improve the facilities and develop good teaching programs, surely many of these kids playing in-line hockey will also become ice hockey players."

Maislin became involved with Israeli hockey almost by accident. In November 2002, a friend asked him, because of his hockey background and business connections, to chair an event in Montreal for a visiting Israeli hockey team. He did it, met the players and coach, and he's been hooked ever since.

The project has had a major impact on him. "It's been a life-changing experience," says Maislin, who runs Maislin Transport, a successful Montreal based international transport company, and who headed a group that almost bought the Buffalo Sabres NHL franchise last year.

"I'm so happy I'm doing this project. It's something positive which, in its own way, can help Israel. I believe sport promotes peace, and by Israel taking part in international events, it will help bring a different image to the world."

For some, Maislin's crusade for Israeli hockey may sound far-fetched. But since when did conventional thinking carry the day where Israel is concerned? If it did, would Israel even exist today? As Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern Zionism, said: "If you will it, it is no dream."

Maybe Maislin's on to something. Could it be next year in Jerusalem, at centre ice?

The Globe Poll: where ignorance meets prejudice

Should the editors of the Globe and Mail be fired for violating basic journalistic norms? You won't see this question in any instant newspaper or television poll, but it deserves to be asked.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

A single sentence, in the form of an online "Globe Poll" earlier this month, stripped away the Globe's facade of journalistic objectivity and revealed an astonishing level of ignorance and prejudice. In the "question of the day" on its website, the Globe went beyond the world of celebrity lifestyles to ask: "Should all financial and political aid to Israel be cut off until a just peace with the Palestinians is in place?" These 21 words were deemed sufficient to encompass this complex and bitter ethno-national conflict. The history of Zionism, Arab rejectionism, decades of warfare and terrorism, thousands of murders and destroyed lives, Iranian missiles, and failed peace efforts were reduced to a few thoughtless words. It simply boggles the mind.

It would be a mistake to simply attribute the Globe Poll to an underling with no experience. According to globeandmail.com site editor Angus Frame, the poll's question was "crafted" – a term suggesting some thought went into it. In responding to my protest over the use of the Globe Poll to demonize Israel, Frame explained: "We are greatly saddened by the tragic and continuing loss of both Israeli and Palestinian life and would dearly love for a peaceful solution to be found. Countless opinions have been offered on possible solutions and some people suggest that the active involvement of outside governments such as that of the United States has slowed the path to peace."

Like an adolescent, an editor of "Canada's national newspaper" unabashedly bases his work on emotional responses to tragic loss of life and on hopes for peace. And just as simplistically, Frame asks for a "just" solution – if only readers would know what that means. In fact, there are many definitions, which is precisely the problem.

From the context of the poll question and Frame's defence of it, the Globe's definition of a "just solution" appears to be identical to that used by Palestinian and Arab rejectionists – meaning that one way or another, Israel should disappear. For them, "justice" means that the millions of Arabs who claim Palestinian refugee status would march into Israel, putting an end to Jewish sovereignty. Echoing attacks on Israel's legitimacy at the United Nations and far beyond, Christian and Muslim sovereignty is perfectly acceptable, but a dominant Jewish culture is somehow "unjust."

But there are many other definitions of a "just solution." Jordan could be declared an official Palestinian state, while Israel maintains control of the remaining territory pledged under the British Mandate and the Balfour Declaration. There is a great deal of justice in this approach as well.

Whatever the author of the Globe Poll meant by "just peace," the means under consideration – stopping "all financial and political aid to Israel" – were particularly facile. As Frame spelled out in his response, the real problem – no surprise here – is American support for Israel. Like many Canadian nationalists (including many CBC reporters), Frame expresses his love of country through blind hostility to his southern neighbours. In this way, he kills two birds with one stone – or carefully aimed grenade – Israel and the United States.

Despite this (weak) defence, by the end of the day, after complaints, the Globe was forced to change the poll's wording. Other options were added, including cutting off aid to the Palestinians, or to both sides. But this formulation was also facile and maintained the implicit and absurd link between U.S. support for Israel and the absence of peace.

Beyond the particular example at hand, this quintessential Canadian newspaper consistently fails to look inward for the sources of terror and brutality. If the Globe took an honest look at the issues, it would discover that the Canadian government's often blind (and naive) political and financial support for Palestinian victimization and anti-Israel incitement (along with similar European and UN support) has encouraged the Palestinian leadership of Yasser Arafat and company in their chosen path.

So if the Globe and Mail wants to repair its damaged reputation, when undertaking another poll on the mysterious larger world, it would be useful to include some Canadian content.

The Kirshner File

Letter from the Amazon

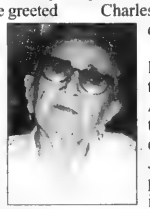
Fresh off ships from the cities of northern Morocco, they penetrated the tangled depths of Brazil's great, mysterious Amazon rainforest, their imaginations fired by the heady dream of striking it rich during the fleeting rubber boom.

Sheldon Kirshner in Brazil

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, legions of young, adventurous Jewish men, bearing such surnames as Cohen, Pinto, Levy, Gabbai, Serfaty, Azulay, Bensimon and Sorruya, bade tearful farewells to parents, siblings and relatives in Rabat, Tangier and Tetouan and courageously ventured into the vast, trackless and largely unexplored equatorial jungles of Brazil.

Braving hostile native Indian populations and tropical diseases, fending off attacks by ferocious beasts and poisonous snakes and forced to adjust to the hardships of a hot, humid climate and the loneliness of a harsh new land, they played an integral role in the expanding rubber trade.

After a potentially perilous voyage across the storm-tossed Atlantic Ocean, first by sailboat and later by steamer, these Sephardi adventurers landed in Belem, at the mouth of the muddy yellow Amazon River, where they were greeted by fellow Moroccan Jews.



Esther Azulay Benchimol

Jews from Morocco had settled in Belem – the capital of the Amazonian state of Para – before and after Brazil gained independence from Portugal in 1822. There they established a synagogue in 1824.

Marranos, Jews masquerading as Catholics, preceded the Moroccans in Belem. But ultimately, the Marranos were assimilated and lost their identity as Jews.

Known also as New Christians, the Marranos were instrumental in the European colonization of Brazil. Pedro Alvares Cabral, the Portuguese admiral who landed in what is now Brazil in 1500, was accompanied by Gasper da Gama, a Jew who had been forcibly baptized.

New Christians founded sugar plantations and mills, took part in the African slave trade, engaged in tax farming and produced some of Brazil's earliest literary figures. When Holland temporarily wrested parts of northeastern Brazil from Portugal in the first quarter of the 17th century, Jews in Recife came out of the closet and formed the first shul in the Americas. Soon, they fled, making their way to the Caribbean island of Curacao and the Dutch colony of Manhattan in North America.

Under a royal decree in 1773, Portugal abolished anti-Semitic restrictions that had kept professing Jews out of Brazil. Jewish settlers returned to Brazil, a process hastened by the advent of Brazil's proclamation of independence and the abolition, in 1891, of the last vestiges of religious discrimination.

Belem attracted the first wave of Moroccan Jews, many of whom earned a living by extracting animal hides, hardwoods, medicinal plants, spices and rubber – black gold – from the rainforest.

Latex, the sticky, milky-white resin extracted from rubber trees growing wild in the jungle, was supposedly used by the Mayas and the Aztecs to make flexible artifacts. The French mathematician Charles Marie de la Contamine discovered latex during an expedition to the Amazon in the 1730s. The first modern application for rubber was the eraser. Rubber shoes and raincoats were not too far behind. Indeed, the rubber shoe industry helped bring prosperity to Belem.

Charles Goodyear, the American inventor, developed a vulcanization process in 1839 that made rubber more durable. It was a tremendous scientific breakthrough whose impact on the Amazon's economy and the migration of Moroccan Jews to Brazil was quite significant. In 1888, the Briton John Dunlop received a patent for pneumatic rubber tires, which further increased world demand for latex and caused its price to soar.

During much of the 19th century, Brazil enjoyed a virtual monopoly on rubber. But in 1876, a British explorer named Henry Wickham smuggled thousands of rubber seeds to England. From there, they were taken to the Malayan peninsula, a development that would have severe consequences.

The rubber trade, not to mention the Amazon – an almost pristine region of seven million square kilometres – captured the imagination of Moroccan Jews.

Hobbled by poverty, persecution, plagues and famines, young Jewish men from Morocco reinvented themselves in the wilderness of Brazil. Arriving in Belem, where they were invariably met by family or school friends and former neighbours, some of the newcomers remained there. Others, fearless of heart and undeterred by the prospect of solitude far from home, struck westward, following the mighty Amazon River and its manifold tributaries to cities and towns like Manaus, Tefe, Itacoatiara, Obidos, Manacapuru and Cameta.

Still others went as far as Iquitos, in Peru. In some cases, Jewish traders cohabited with local Indians and caboclos, people of mixed race. Their Catholic descendants, living in Amazon backwaters, still bear Moroccan Jewish surnames.

More often than not, traders supported impoverished families back in Morocco by sending remittances.

Susan Gilson Miller – a Harvard University scholar who specializes in Moroccan affairs and has written a monograph on the Jews of the Amazon – says that itinerant Jewish traders and middlemen from Morocco constituted the backbone of the rubber boom, which lasted from approximately 1890 to about 1914 and briefly flared again during World War II.

Typically, the rubber trees were tapped by native Indians, who gathered the latex and brought the substance to riverbank depots. Passing traders exchanged the rubber for manufactured goods such as cooking pots and cloth. After collecting yet more quantities of rubber, a trader would decamp at a river port and pass the latex to a middleman, invariably a Jewish compatriot, for a replenished supply of commodities to sell to the natives.

The Brazilian rubber boom greatly enriched a handful of Manaus-based rubber barons, and was a passing phenomenon. The bubble burst due to the export of low cost rubber from plantations in southeast Asia and the invention of synthetic rubber.

With the collapse of the rubber boom, a good many Jews returned to Morocco, for better or worse. But other Moroccans never left Amazonia, the six states that comprise the Amazon region today.

I recently had the distinct pleasure of meeting several descendants of these traders and middlemen, who form one of the world's most remote and exotic Jewish communities. I was flattered when they told me that I was the first Canadian journalist to visit them. I met them in Manaus, the sultry capital of Amazonas, the largest state in Amazonia. Stretching along the shores of the ginger ale-coloured Rio Negro, Manaus is 1,600 kilometres west of Belem. Manaus has a population of 1.5 million, the majority of whom are caboclos. Five hours by air from Miami on a direct flight, Manaus is really little more than a big, busy clearing in a humongous and enveloping rainforest whose nooks and crannies have yet to be plumbed and explored.

The oldest Jewish person I talked to was Esther Azulay Benchimol, the daughter of Jewish immigrants from Rabat. She was born in 1918 in Coari, 26 hours by boat from Manaus. A feisty woman with a seemingly remarkable memory, she was raised in Itacoatiara, on the banks of the Rio Uburu. Married at 15, she and her husband settled in Manaus in 1932, long after the glory days of the rubber boom.

My contact in Manaus, the person who arranged interviews and tours of the community, was Isaac Dahan, a 55-year-old physician and cantor. The former president of the Comite Israelita Do Amazonas, he was born in Alenquer, in the state of Para, and moved to Manaus in 1972. Dahan's maternal grandparents, Jacob and Rachel Fima, hail from Tetouan. Dahan's father, Shalom, who sold Brazil nuts and rubber, was born in Rabat in 1910. Shalom met his wife, Esther – Dahan's mother – in Belem.

Through Dahan, I was introduced to Celso Neves Assayag, the current and three-time president of the Comite Israelita Do Amazonas. Now 49, Assayag is a food wholesaler. His great-grandfather is from Morocco, but his grandfather, Joseph, was born in Belem. Assayag's father, Mario Meir, was born in Parintins, 22 hours by boat from Manaus. Assayag is of mixed parentage. His mother, Nair Neves, was a Catholic from Tefe, 72 hours by boat from Manaus.

My 40-year-old interpreter, Janet Pinheiro Israel, is partially of Christian origin as well, but feels completely Jewish. Her mother, a former Catholic, is a convert to Judaism. But in the Amazon, as you will read in my next column, this is hardly unusual.

Let go of all the rules at Purim

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

During a six-month stay in the remote desert town of Arad, Israel, 13 years ago, I grew accustomed to rising at dawn, making a cup of strong Israeli coffee, and sitting on a plastic chair in the corner of my second-storey porch.

During the week, the day opened slowly, like a black and white photograph, first with a sleepy view of a dry, ancient desert, then with one then another man hurriedly crossing the single road encircling the town, next the careful steps of the egg man cradling a large gray cardboard crate while he moved steadily over a stone path, and finally, just before the cool of the morning burst into hot colours, young mothers with babies in strollers, ambling toward the sidewalk.

But one morning, my porch view started with swirls of colour. Toddlers to teens, dressed in red capes, orange wigs, pink sparkling gowns and purple masks, darted back and forth across the play yard, jumped over the stone path, vanishing behind the school building, only to reappear, charging across the car-less street. I opened the windows to listen to their sounds.

My roommate woke up and said, "It's Purim."

And I quickly ran downstairs to see.

Outside, I was greeted by more costumed children, laughing and tossing candy in the air. As I walked toward town, I saw plates of hamantaschen and sweets exchanged freely between neighbours and shopkeepers. Then I saw ladders extending up the highest posts. Smiling townspeople were on top, attaching bright paper decorations. Speechless, I stood under the morning Negev sun and soaked in the magical feeling of celebrating with a majority instead of with a proud but small minority.

In The Jewish Holidays, A Guide and Commentary, author Michael Strassfeld explains, "Purim affirms the bright moments of victory and denies the long, bleak centuries of persecution," and so it has remained a time "to feel good and let loose."

So when my daughter and I make hamantaschen, the triangle-shaped Purim treat representing Haman's hat, we let go of all rules. Instead of opting for just the traditional fruit fillings, we open our cabinets and pull out all our favourite candies. The kitchen table becomes a buffet of white chocolate chunks, dark chocolate morsels, rainbow sprinkles, red and yellow gummy bears, blue, pink and purple coloured sugars, and anything else that melts, tastes good, or is just fun to eat. Then, over the course of a candy-filled afternoon, hopefully including friends, we create colourful, playful, sparkly and delicious hamantaschen.

One year, after the first batch came out of the oven, we each chose a big white chocolate, dark chocolate, sugar sprinkled hamantasch to eat. With hands and lips sparkling with red and yellow sugars, my daughter said, "This is fun. I feel sorry for people who aren't Jewish. They don't get to make hamantaschen!"

YELLOW CAKE MIX HAMANTASCHEN

I got this wonderfully quick recipe from my sister, who got it from someone else and so on. I even saw it submitted to a synagogue cookbook from a woman living in Israel. It is not only simple enough for your older children to make, it is also delicious!

Dough:
1 box yellow cake mix
1 cup flour
2 large eggs, beaten
2 tbsp. water, approximately

Filling Suggestions: Favourite jams, poppy seed or prune filling (from can), chocolate morsels, white chocolate chunks, coloured sugars, chocolate and rainbow sprinkles, marshmallows, chopped candy bars, gummy bears, candy hearts or any other fun treat you dare to try!

Purim Food Ideas

Cake makes a great gift

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Instead of agonizing about what to do or spending a fortune on a fancy gift basket for that special person on your mishloach manot list, why not consider making an elegant dessert for him or her and send it with a nice bottle of kosher wine or liqueur?

Many of us receive so many baskets of delicacies for Purim that, although they are often lovely, we begin to panic about how to use it all up before Pesach. How delightful it would be to receive a special dessert that can be served at the Purim seudah.

GAN EDEN CAKE

1¾ cup flour
1½ cups sugar
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. salt
6 tbsp. cocoa powder
½ cup shortening or margarine
2 eggs
1 cup orange juice
1 tsp. vanilla
1 container pareve whipping cream for filling
1 package chocolate pudding mix for filling
1 bar pareve chocolate for shavings

Mix flour, sugar, baking soda, salt and cocoa together. Add shortening or margarine, orange juice and vanilla. Beat two minutes in mixer. Add eggs and beat well. Pour into a greased and lightly floured tube pan. Bake at 350 degrees for one hour. Let cool for 10 minutes and remove from pan.

Mix pareve whipping cream and chocolate pudding mix and beat until stiff. When cake has thoroughly cooled, slice in half horizontally and spread filling on bottom half. Top with other half. Make fudge frosting and pour over top of cake, letting it drip down the sides. Add chocolate curls before frosting has had time to set.

FUDGE FROSTING

½ cup margarine
½ cup cocoa powder
16 oz. powdered sugar
¼ cup water
2 tsp. vanilla

In a saucepan, melt margarine. Add cocoa slowly, keeping saucepan on low heat. Add powdered sugar and liquid and stir well. Remove from heat and add vanilla. Pour over cake immediately. Note: If you accidentally overcook this frosting it will turn into delicious fudge.

It's time to let go of all the rules

Coat two cookie sheets with shortening or vegetable spray. Preheat oven to 375. In large bowl, combine cake mix, flour, beaten eggs and water until batter is well moistened and holds together. If dough is dry and crumbly, add water a few drops at a time. (Hint: After starting with a fork, I used my hands to finish mixing and added one teaspoon more water.)

On floured surface, roll out dough to ⅛-inch thickness. Cut circles with 4-inch round and/or 2½-inch round cookie cutter or cup, to make both large and small hamantaschen. Place circles on prepared cookie sheets and spoon fillings or candies in centre of each. (Hint: the more you put in the centre, the trickier it is to get folded corners to hold together during baking – but we do it anyway!)

Fold into triangles by pinching tops together first, then bottom. Make sure top corners of triangle lean inward over filling so they won't come apart during baking. If dough is dry, moisten hands with a few drops of water while working or spray dough sparingly with water mister. After folding, sprinkle edges with more toppings or chocolates, as desired.

Bake for 5-7 minutes, until slightly golden. Do not overbake. Smaller hamantaschen take less time. Remove from tray to cool.

Servings: 10 4-inch, and 17 2½-inch from one batch.

Serving Suggestions: Eat and share all day on Purim!

Food, Scrumptious Food

Cooking school prepares haredi men for culinary careers

By DAPHNA BERMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Dressed in checkered black-and-white pants, long white aprons, and tall, fully starched chef's hats placed carefully above their kippot, a group of 28 haredi men who recently enrolled in the newly launched Kosher Culinary Academy in Jerusalem set out to prove that kosher food doesn't have to sacrifice taste or class.

The 10-month course, taught exclusively in English, has attracted 22 culinary-hopefuls from the United States, Canada, and the United Kingdom. It aims to prepare a new generation of haredi chefs, most of whom did not fit into the traditional haredi yeshiva world and all of whom have a passion, quite simply, for good food.

British-born Yochanan (formerly Jean-René) Lambaise, the academy's founder, says the idea for the school grew out of the increasingly pressing need for sophisticated, high-class and genuinely quality kosher food.

"Religious businessmen want to be able to entertain their non-religious clients," Lambaise says. "They want to be able to take clients to a place that's in vogue and doesn't smell like lokshen kugel."

The class is open only to men, and the majority of those enrolled are yeshiva dropouts who didn't quite flourish under strict yeshiva regimens.

"Our students are religious kids who didn't make it through the system," Lambaise explains. "In the haredi world, if you can't sit and learn all day, you are considered an outcast. Here we show people that they might not be able to learn in yeshiva, but they can learn a trade."

Still, the course demands that the students sit for two hours every morning and learn the religious laws pertaining to a kosher kitchen. Though all 28 students have passed through yeshivot, practical kosher laws were always relegated to the women's sphere. Many of the men may have previously learned sections in the Talmud dealing with the laws separating meat and milk, but few have ever studied these laws' practical ramifications.

For some students, dropping out of a full-time yeshiva program is a welcome change of pace.

Zvi Clayman says he was looking for work in a field that demanded the use of both his head and his hands. The British-born 23-year-old immigrated to Israel with his family 20 years ago, and is excited that the course will enable him to "earn a living in a respectable way."

Still, Clayman, like others in the class, wouldn't have dared enroll in a course with women as classmates, and therefore saw the Kosher Culinary Academy as the perfect answer to his problem.

Clayman and the other students have learned French food vocabulary, kitchen safety and basic cutting techniques. They diced, chopped, and sliced 16 kilograms of onions, learned the definition of a poissonnier (it means fishmonger) and discovered that cuisine is really just the French word for kitchen. They have also learned that the steel-toe boots they are required to wear every day are a must in any busy kitchen.

The course has been surprisingly well-accepted in haredi communities, says Sarah Manning, the academy's administrator.

"People in the haredi community don't define themselves by their professions, and so it's perfectly respectable to be a bus driver, teacher, or chef," she explains.

Although the 10-month course costs $12,500 (US), Lambaise notes that studying in yeshiva all day without a source of income can be an even greater expense

Lambaise, in the meantime, is hoping to ultimately teach his students to prepare dishes such as drambuie chocolate charlotte with coffee bean sauce and chicken sausages with lemon, which is a fusion of French and Turkish cuisine.

He plans to open a restaurant after Passover at the Holy Land Hotel, so that students will be able to test their skills on customers.

The restaurant, he predicts, will be a welcomed by harried and over-stressed religious Jerusalemites. So many of the world's problems, he adds, can be solved over the dinner table.

New hologram to help prevent unauthorized labels on kosher meat

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A new system of labelling kosher food is on the market that ensures the authenticity of poultry, beef and fish products.

The HoloPoinT system, founded in Israel about three years ago by Israel Sar-El, a retired colonel in the Israel Defence Forces, is introduced on a meat processing line just before final packaging.

As pieces of meat or chicken pass through the line, the HoloPoinT system inserts and clamps a plastic tie and attaches an exclusive hologram label.

Sar-El started up HoloPoinT through Yozmot-Granot Initiative Centre, a non-profit, government-supported agency with a program for startup companies in a variety of industries. He says when consumers buy kosher poultry, fish or meat, they must rely on the package's labelling to ensure a product's authenticity.

Current methods of stickers on or in the packaging, or metal rings around a chicken's leg, can be easily forged and used on standard produce, Sar-El says.

"Using this hologram allows a product to be protected from the manufacturer to the kitchen of a housekeeper."

The system meets the needs of all those involved in producing and marketing niche meat products, he says.

"Producers are confident that their products cannot be misrepresented, certifying authorities know their labelling cannot be forged and consumers are assured that they are purchasing genuine kosher products."

Sar-El says the system includes a quick, efficient procedure that does not lengthen or complicate the packaging process, as well as microwave safe tags and the non-forgeable hologram, which is marketed exclusively in the United States by DuPont and contains critical data such as traceability information.

Unauthorized certification has been a problem in Israel, where products such as honey, ice cream, cheese, mayonnaise, coffee, gummy candies, cookies and olive oil have all carried false labels. As well, Sar-El says, significant numbers of establishments and manufacturers use a kosher claim without any kashrut agency backing them up.

Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Canada, who is looking into using the HoloPoinT system, says, "It seems a safe and secure high-tech system of tagging products in a way that is impossible to forge. There is certainly less room for mistakes."

Holograms are currently being used with the Star-K kosher certification says president Avrom Pollak. "Our continuous efforts to improve service to the public, drives us to seek methods and technology that enhances our supervision and makes the labeling of products in our care more reliable.

"The use of HoloPoinT will upgrade kosher supervision, and will be of great help in our constant vigilance in preventing fraudulent mislabeled kosher products from entering the marketplace."

Rabbi Moshe Elefant, executive rabbinic co-ordinator at the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America (OU), says the labels will be helpful in the packaging of products produced under supervision to guarantee that only such products bear the OU symbol.

Does belief in God come from within?

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

Among the most iconoclastic and controversial Jewish thinkers of the last 50 years was the late Yeshaiahu Leibowitz. Leibowitz, who lived in Israel, concerned himself with the issues confronting Judaism in modern times and Judaism in the Jewish state. He was a forceful and provocative personality.

From the fall of 1986 to the fall of 1987, Leibowitz gave talks of 12 to 15 minutes every Friday on Israeli television about the weekly Torah reading. These talks were later published in book form under the title Hearot l'Parshiyot HaShavua (notes to the weekly Torah readings).

There are many engaging and stimulating comments in these talks. For instance, commenting on Parshat Beshallach and the crossing of the Red Sea, Leibowitz points out that of the 116 verses that make up this Torah reading, 58 are concerned with the Exodus from Egypt and the miraculous events at the sea. Leibowitz summarizes this first half of the parshah in the Hebrew words: "vaya'aminu b'HaShem" – "and the people believed in God."

But in the next 58 verses of the reading, we find nothing about these events. Instead, this section is characterized by the Hebrew word "vayilonu" – "and they complained." The people complained that there was no water or that the water they were drinking was bitter; they complained that they had no bread to eat. Even the raining down from heaven of the manna, another miracle from God, takes place in an atmosphere of discontent and division.

Further, Leibowitz points out, the faith in God that the people had in the first part of the reading has disappeared. Thus, the people cry out, "Is God indeed in our midst or not?" The reader is left with the impression that the miraculous events of the first part of Beshallach have made no impression at all upon the people of Israel.

Leibowitz contends that we learn something very important from Beshallach – that the miracle, the revealing of Divine intervention, and the response to this by humanity of song or poetry, all this is just an episode that passes from human memory and has no influence upon what follows. Moreover, what is of lasting, ongoing impact is not the poetry but the prose of life – the complaining, the water, the manna, the questioning. It is within this background of the prosaic that the Eternal revealed the eternal and elemental Jewish work, the Torah, to Israel at Sinai. The miraculous stirs a belief that is only short-lived.

Leibowitz claims we know from Jewish history that this is so. We know of so many generations of Jews who cleaved to God and Torah, and indeed, sacrificed their lives on behalf of Torah. None of these generations witnessed a revelation of God's power comparable to the parting of the Red Sea, none of them experienced wonders and miracles, none of them heard the voices of prophets speaking Divine prophecies, and, in many cases, God did not intervene to aid or rescue them. Nevertheless, they maintained their belief and trust in Him.

Thus, according to Leibowitz, there is no connection between the phenomena of the natural world and the decision to accept and take upon oneself the observance of Torah and mitzvot. This decision can only derive from within a person and if it does not, even Divine Intervention cannot force such an individual to change his mind.

Leibowitz challenges us who live in this age of wonders in technology and miracles of science. Which half of Parshat Beshallach has more meaning and resonance for us? Is it the first half with its miracles and poetry or the second half with its struggles and prose? How we choose defines our religious and spiritual persona. We need to decide if religious faith comes to each of us from without or from within.

Does university kill Jewish identity?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Recently, there has been concern expressed in several quarters about the potentially negative influences that university life may have on Jewish identity and religious faith. The problem is multifaceted, of course, and means different things to different people. Some focus on how Jewish students are ill prepared to hear arguments that the State of Israel is a racist and oppressive occupier. For others, the issue is the communication of a perspective, in various courses, that is not in consonance with the Orthodox weltanschauung. And for yet a third group, it is the exposure of Jewish youth to attractive and intelligent non-Jews that may portend romantic, and even marital, entanglements.

Lost in all of this are the possibilities for Jewish renewal that exist on campus, especially in places that are not located in the heart of big cities with large Jewish populations. From a personal perspective, having taught Jewish studies at Queen's University in Kingston for a number of years now, I can attest to a development that I see each year: the positive inspiration that Jewish studies courses can give to a significant number of students. Many Jewish kids have actually been somewhat alienated from the religious education they received in their pre-university years, only to find an entrance back into the world of Judaism through the "back door" of a Jewish studies course, which may allow them the intellectual freedom – hopefully spared from too many ideological presuppositions – to gingerly begin to re-examine their spiritual and historical commitments.

In all the current rhetoric about Orthodox students being "corrupted" by discussions in "Higher Bible Criticism" and "Maimonides 101," much of the real trend on the ground works in reverse. Students can find a range of Jewish expression they did not know existed and an appropriate atmosphere to explore their personal connection to a fiercely wise and remarkably supple and diverse tradition. This is not true in all cases, naturally, nor is every Jewish studies course conducive to such inquiry. Much depends on the attitude of the professor. Do they view their course as a way to demonstrate 100 kinds of erudition, with the result being that Judaism is ground into exceedingly boring scholarly dust? Or do they understand that – the academic framework notwithstanding – they have an opportunity to make Judaism come alive in a unique way?

Answers to these questions are never generic, nor is the situation the same on every campus. I am not naive about the vast and rigid propagation of academic dogma, in which politically and culturally correct positions are fomented in the guise of open dialogue and the search for truth.

Professors often delude themselves that they are paragons of accuracy and enlightenment in a world of superstition and cant, but they do so at their own peril (and even moreso at the peril of their students). In spite of this, it would be equally presumptuous to maintain that universities automatically sound the death knell for Jewish identity. In many instances, they ring in the opening bell.

Jewish Life

Psalms to help you cope

Healing Psalms: The Dialogues with God That Help You Cope with Life*, by Rabbi Joshua O. Haberman, John Wiley & Sons, $38.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The 150 Psalms are the lyrical masterpiece of the Tanach. Most of them are products of the highest poetical imagination. Although the frame of reference may have changed, they still express the full range of moods and emotions that reflect our modern predicament: fear and hope, revenge and forgiveness, cruelty and compassion, integrity and betrayal, sin and righteousness. Some of them overflow with joy and praise of God's goodness, others are filled with the dark hues of sorrow and lamentation.

Rabbi Joshua O. Haberman, former senior rabbi at the Washington Hebrew Congregation and president of the Foundation of Jewish Studies, is also the author of The God I believe In, an incisive book of interviews with eminent personalities.

Healing Psalms is not a scholarly treatise. It is not concerned with who wrote the Psalms or when. Instead, Rabbi Haberman presents the text of each Psalm and then proceeds in a few paragraphs of commentary to extract its basic idea or teaching.

These brief homilies are replete with apt quotations from a variety of sources, old and new, and include Rabbi Haberman's rich experience and insights.

The following few examples are typical of his approach. From Psalm 11, the major idea expounded is that every life makes a difference. "What is my place in the universe? Compared to the immeasurable vastness of the cosmos and the billions of years it has been evolving, you are a speck of dust, and your life is just a flicker.

"An answer is implied in his exclamation: 'Yet You have made him but little less than divine and adorned him with glory and majesty! You have made him master over Your handiwork.'"

Psalm 116 stresses the importance of being a listener.

"The psalmist is overjoyed to have found a listening ear. A perceptive young woman told a man who liked her: 'We do not know each other well enough; we have not yet been silent together.' The fourth-century Greek philosopher Zeno of Citium summed it all up in his saying: 'The reason why we have two ears and only one mouth is so that we may listen more and talk less.'"

Psalm 126 carries the reflection that there is no gain without pain.

"The psalmist's words, 'They that sow in tears shall reap in joy,' have become a proverb in many languages. It states the compelling truth that effort and sacrifice are rewarded. Life is not a lottery. Things don't happen at random. The law of cause and effect applies. What you put in determines what you get out. To be sure, not all efforts are rewarded in the same way, but there is no reward without some kind of exertion."

Psalm 146 teaches that the Lord protects strangers.

"The philosopher Hermann Cohen discerned in the biblical protection of aliens the birth of the idea of humanity: 'With the law of shielding the alien from wrong, true religion begins. The alien was protected not because he was a member of one's clan, community or people, but because he was a human being. In the alien, man discovered the idea of humanity.'"

This is a book to be cherished and to be read and reread, a helpful and inspirational guide along life's journey.

Bar mitzvah advice and software

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The date is set. The hall is booked. Your bar mitzvah boy or bat mitzvah girl has begun preparing for the big day. But now the panic is beginning is set in. With all the details involved in planning a simchah, you could try to do it all yourself. Or you could take advantage of websites and software designed to help make your planning a little bit easier. Today, a guide to simchah guides.

Please note that I can't vouch for the commercial software products mentioned below because I haven't had a chance to use them (yet). But I can offer you a couple of tips. Some companies allow you to download trial versions so you can try before you buy. And if you are interested in purchasing software, plug the name of the product into a search engine like Google [www.google.com] so you can shop around for the best price.

First, though, let's start with some free advice and assistance. MitzvahChic Swap Info has great ideas from parents who have been there and planned that – and have survived to tell the tale. Some topics currently under discussion include:

- How do I create a bar mitzvah that doesn't seem like a clone of all the others?
- How do I stay on budget?
- How do I find a connection between the Torah portion and the theme we've chosen for our bat mitzvah?
- And my favourite: Where can I find Stanley Cup centrepieces? [http://makeashorterlink.com/?G48A23B67]

Caterer? Check. Invitations? Check. Videographer? Check. If you love using checklists to keep yourself in line, take a look at the free forms you'll find at [MyJewishWedding.com]. Although this is primarily a wedding site, many of the lists can do double-duty for a bar or bat mitzvah. You can download and print 16 free planning worksheets and checklists that cover almost everything facet of your simchah [http://makeashorterlink.com/?W1A532857].

According to its promotional material, the Mazal Tov Planner will help you track your invitations and RSVPs, arrange seating lists, plan aliyahs and other honours and even estimate your no-shows [www.jewishsoftware.com/products/104.asp]. Also check out Bnai Mitzvah Party Planning Software [www.castlecomputer.com/bnai.htm], My Bar/Bat Mitzvah Companion [www.fivestarsoftware.com/mitzvah/] and other software listed at Maven [www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=116].

While their parents are worrying about flowers and seating plans, kids have a challenge of their own: learning how to recite the parshah or haftorah. Navigating the Bible is one of my all-time favourite websites. Every verse of the Torah is reproduced in the script seen in Torah scrolls along with a version with vowels and another transliterated using English characters. If that weren't enough, you can click on any verse to hear it chanted online [http://bible.ort.org/].

Navigating the Bible can also be purchased on a CD-ROM so that you are able to practice without an Internet connection. You can check out other software such as Bar Mitzvah Tutor [www.jewishshopsonline.com/product105.html] and Trope Trainer [www.davka.com/cgi-bin/product.cgi?product=301].

The simchah is over. The thank-you notes are written. The bills are paid. What's left to be done? Shep some nachas! The OnlySimchas website lets you tell the world about your celebration and offers you a place to upload photos of the event [www.onlysimchas.com/]. The pictures are sweet but what makes this site truly lovely are the comments in the guestbook:

"Well done, Moishie – you did us all proud."

"Dina, you are truly a special person and I am so glad that we became good buddies over the past two summers in camp."

"DUDE!!! YOU ARE NOW A MAN... CONGRATS"

Mazal tov – and happy planning!

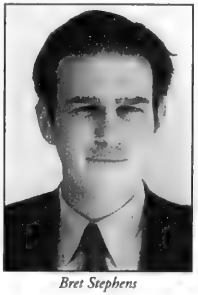
Youth not wasted on Jerusalem Post's Bret Stephens

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation



Bret Stephens

Despite his relative youth, Bret Stephens, the 30-year-old editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Post is far from being overwhelmed or intimidated by the challenges that face him in his third year at the helm.

"There are plenty of challenges, although I don't think my age seriously handicaps my efforts to address them, not after two eventful years on the job," says Stephens, who is the youngest editor-in-chief in the 70-year history of the Jerusalem Post.

Stephens, the keynote speaker at UJA Federation's Top Gifts Closing Celebration on March 3, admits to three types of challenges that face him daily: financial, editorial and political.

"Financially, the paper has been hard-hit by three years of recession, which have cut into our ad revenues and our printing business. Matters haven't been helped by the steep decline in tourism. Editorially, the challenge is to meet reader demand for speed, accuracy and depth. The Jerusalem Post is a daily paper, but 85 per cent of our audience is online, so our real deadlines are not daily, but hourly. If there's a terror attack, we want to get the news out fast, but not so fast that we make mistakes."

"As for politics, there's a high degree of sensitivity among our readers about our editorial line, our use of terminology, the choice of stories, even the choice of pictures. For instance, do we call the territories Judea and Samaria or the West Bank? Should we characterize an attack as a terrorist or a guerilla action? There's a lot of subjectivity here, plenty of judgment calls and readers aren't always forgiving."

The son of a Mexican-born father and an Italian-born mother, Stephens was raised in Mexico City and educated at the University of Chicago and the London School of Economics. Prior to joining the Post, he was an editorial writer and editor for The Wall Street Journal in Brussels and New York. He is also published regularly in Commentary, First Things, and The London Times. His articles, translated into dozens of languages, have appeared in many other international publications.

As for the much-talked about PR battle between the Israel and Palestinian sides, Stephens feels that it's important for Israel to avoid getting into a "victimhood competition," to gain more sympathy from the worldwide press. He was referring to Israel's video release of scenes of the recent Jerusalem bus bombing that killed 11 people including former Torontonian Chezi Goldberg.

"As for releasing graphic footage of terror attacks, I think the effort is misplaced," he says. "Israel doesn't need better images or spokesmen. Israel needs rhetorical strategies to confront key Palestinian arguments about what this conflict is all about. The PR battle has several fronts. In Europe, Israel has lost it; in the United States, it has won it. In both cases, the outcomes have at least as much to do with existing popular prejudices as they do with the effectiveness of this or that PR battle."

Although Stephens does not see himself as a PR agent for Israel, he believes that Israel's story does not receive a fair hearing in other media.

"One of the reasons I left The Wall Street Journal for the Post was because I felt the Western media was getting the story wrong," says Stephens. "I do not think Israel is the aggressor here. Insofar as getting the story right helps Israel, I guess you could say I'm trying to help Israel."

When asked about the impact of Conrad Black's dismissal from Hollinger Corporation, which owns the Post, Stephens was brief and to the point.

"It's too soon to tell," he says.

Stephens did little to hide his feelings about the current legal problems facing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and his son, Gilad, involving allegations of financial contributions in exchange for political favours toward a large business development.

"It will be Israel's loss if the case against Sharon is proved," he says. "Sharon succeeded in uniting the country behind him in a way that no previous PM has since the days of Eshkol or even Ben Gurion. This was no mean achievement in a country so divided that it cashiered Sharon's three immediate predecessors early and saw another one cruelly assassinated. National unity is not just a political achievement; it is a moral and strategic one, against an enemy that sought, often successfully, to turn Israel against itself. I don't see any leaders on the horizon who could provide the same kind of leadership, Labor or Likud."

Campus attracts community interest

There's an increasing stream of inquiries to UJA Federation's Vaughan Jewish Community Campus office at Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road about the planned new campus for York Region residents.

The campus – a project of UJA's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative - will be built on a 50-acre parcel of land at the corner of Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue. It will include schools, agencies, services and programs to keep up with York Region's fast-growing Jewish community, which is expected to reach 75,000 in 10 years. Campus construction will begin Fall 2004.

People are dropping by the office, just south of the site, to view the model, and study architectural images of what will be a state-of-the-art centre for Jewish life.

"We are now sensing the pulse of this community, and it is pounding," says Patricia Tolkin Eppel, UJA Federation Director of Planning for York Region. "The response is one of relief, excitement and anticipation, as the approximately 60,000 members of York Region's Jewish community will soon have their own facility. People are so excited, many have come forward with innovative ideas, offers to volunteer, and requests for rental space."

Vaughan businessman Larry Garber, a father of five, who lives in York Region's King City, and works in Woodbridge, attended a recent community briefing about the new complex, and has been excited ever since.

"I've seen the model, I've spoken with those involved in the planning process, and as a person involved in the Jewish community, I must say this project will be spectacular," says Garber. "This is the most significant Jewish project in Vaughan's history and to have a centre of Jewish life that will be so magnificent in terms of size, quality and services provided, is a tremendous opportunity for us as Jews. It will undoubtedly also help to reconnect countless Jews with the rich traditions of Judaism."

The UJA Federation's Vaughan Campus Office in Rutherford Plaza recently held a mezuzah placement ceremony lead by Rabbi Ezriel Sitzer of the Jewish Centre for Learning & Living in Thornhill. (L-R) Lou Greenbaum, Chair, Land Development; Mark Malinowicz, Project Manager; Patricia Tolkin Eppel, Director of Planning, York Region; Rabbi Sitzer, David Sadowski, Development Manager; and Leo Goldhar, Chair, Steering Committee.

One of Garber's children is currently enrolled at the Richmond Hill branch of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

"One of the incredible services offered by the new campus will be a new CHAT, and I hope that more of my children will be enrolled there in the future. As a concerned member of the Jewish community, I can't say enough about the great things the new campus will do for the Jewish community here," says Garber.

Welcome news for Jewish community

This summer, some members of Toronto's Jewish community will be taking advantage of a unique opportunity – luxury apartments in the heart of the city, 40 per cent below present market value.

These discounted apartments – to be located on Rosewell Avenue in the Lawrence and Avenue Road area – are the brainchild of Russell Masters of Tower Hill Development. The units would normally cost $1,600 a month, but will be available for only $924 beginning in June.

Originally, the units were made available only to clients of Jewish Family & Child Service, JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Service) Toronto, Circle of Care, JVS of Greater Toronto, and students of Hillel of Greater Toronto - all partner agencies of UJA Federation. Today however, they're available to members of the Jewish community who qualify. Potential tenants must have a combined household income of $50,000 or less.

Community members interested in being considered for these one bedroom or one bedroom plus den units, should call Barbara Barak at UJA Federation's Jewish Information Service at 416.631.5843, or by email at bbarak@ujafed.org. Deadline for applications is March 15, 2004.

"As part of our agreement with the City of Toronto for this program to proceed, we were required to build 25 units below market," says Masters. "We then went back to the City and insisted that if we were to do this, we would be allowed to first offer these special units to members within our own Jewish community."

"As a non-profit housing provider in the community, we're excited that this project will fill an important niche in Jewish housing," says Nancy Singer, Executive Director, Kehilla Residential Programme.

Battling anti-Semitism among priorities of Campaign 2005 Chairs

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

With UJA Federation Campaign 2005 quickly approaching, the Chairs of the Campaign, Robert Harlang and Charles Winograd, both identify the ongoing battle against worldwide anti-Semitism as one of the campaign's key objectives.

Robert Harlang

"While many of the issues we'll be dealing with are still being discussed, the one thing that unfortunately remains a constant is the fight against the ongoing resurgence of anti-Semitism. We must be vigilant in Toronto, in Canada, and around the world," says Harlang, an Executive Partner with Richter, Usher & Vineberg, chartered accountants. Harlang, born to Holocaust survivors in Sweden, is a long-time UJA volunteer.

Charles Winograd

"The campaign is important every year," says Winograd, President and CEO of RBC Capital Markets, and a Vice-Chairman of RBC Financial Group. "This year is no exception. And it's more than just the resurgence of anti-Semitism; it's also the chronically critical situation in Israel and the shortage of funds at home for social services and infrastructure, all converging at one time."

When approached to serve Toronto's Jewish community as Chairs of Campaign 2005, neither Harlang nor Winograd hesitated.

"Needless to say, the Jewish community in Toronto and the State of Israel are both important parts of my family's life," says Winograd. "The opportunity to give back to both is a privilege. In Toronto, the social and educational infrastructure that underpins the community needs continuing support and improvements. There are too many vulnerable Jews in the community who need our help and support, and obviously Israel is in need and our help is more essential now than ever."

"I've been involved with UJA for years," says Harlang, "and the work we do for Jews in Toronto, Israel, and around the world, continues to amaze me. I was thrilled to have the opportunity to be part of that dedication to Jewish life. The campaign is about community, the legacy we leave as Jews, and about our future generations. It means so much in terms of Jewish continuity and identity, and helping to maintain the 'Jewish soul.'

"The bottom line in any campaign is raising money to serve the needs of both our local community and Israel," says Winograd. "It is also important to build for our future. New talent in the campaign and a broader base of contributors will provide a better platform for future campaigns."

A taste of the good life

More than 60 members of UJA Federation's Ben Gurion Society recently gathered at the Lonsdale Gallery, owned by Chad Wolfond, for a tutored wine and scotch tasting. Eighty new additions to the Ben Gurion Society were announced during the event. The Ben Gurion Society is comprised of 25-45 year-old donors who have made a minimum gift of $1,000 to the UJA Campaign. Students Save Hearts

By TILLY R. SHAMES
Director of Israel Affairs, Hillel of Greater Toronto

Walking into the Save a Child's Heart wing of the Wolfson Medical Centre in Holon - a suburb of Tel Aviv - is an ethereal experience. It is easy to feel as if one is surrounded by angels.

Save a Child's Heart (SACH), one branch of the IsraAID network of Israeli non-governmental organizations, provides urgently needed pediatric cardiac surgery and follow up care to children from developing countries. With the motto "To save a life is to save a world," this organization has saved hundreds of children directly and will save thousands more in the future by training medical personnel around the world.

"SACH is a wonderful organization because it demonstrates that Israelis are concerned about children all over the world," said Johanna Herman, a University of Toronto student, who visited the SACH facilities in January. After meeting the children and medical team, Johanna decided to volunteer with SACH this summer and will be organizing a toy drive on campus before her departure.

Johanna is not alone in her feelings after visiting the program. Several of the students who spent the afternoon with SACH during Hillel of Greater Toronto's Hadracha trip to Israel in January were so moved by what they saw that they have initiated fundraising projects on campus to support this project. On February 12, Lia Katz and several other Hillel students organized Heart to Heart at U of T, selling chocolates and handing out information to the student body.

"We had an irresistible product for an irresistible cause," said Sarah Nasser, a University of Toronto student who volunteered her day at Heart to Heart. "Our fundraiser was a great way to raise awareness about children in the third world being able to receive heart transplant surgeries from money raised by affluent states." York and Ryerson students have fundraisers planned for March.

Save a Child's Heart began in 1995 when the late Dr. Amram "Ami" Cohen, the former Deputy Chief of cardiovascular surgery and Head of pediatric cardiac surgery for the Wolfson Medical Centre, was contacted by an Ethiopian doctor to help two children in desperate need of heart surgery. Since then, over 750 children from around the world have been treated and saved by the SACH medical team.

SACH staff and children celebrating Christmas, Chanuka and Eid El Fitr, the festival of Fast-Breaking that marks the end of Ramadan.

All children, regardless of race, creed, color, sex or religion are treated free of charge by the SACH medical team. "The most powerful thing I remember from the whole experience was the fact that the program saved the life of a two-month-old Palestinian girl named Shahida," said Jamie Garnet, Ryerson student and participant on Hadracha. In fact, the majority of children upon whom SACH operates each year are Palestinians. The children and their immediate families are brought to Tel Aviv for treatment.

Hundreds of children from China, Congo, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Jordan, Moldova, Nigeria, Vietnam and Zanzibar have been treated, with a success rate of 96 percent. In November 2003, the SACH team successfully operated on a one-week-old Iraqi infant, Bayan Jassem, born with a deadly heart defect.

In addition, SACH's outreach program trains medical personnel in its partner countries, enabling local teams to provide necessary treatment in their own environment. Doctors and nurses are brought to the SACH centre in Tel Aviv for initial training, followed by the Israeli team traveling overseas to educate and perform surgery in cooperation with local personnel until treatment can be provided without direct assistance.

In the anti-Israel environment on campus today, Hillel students are expressing their support for Israel and portraying Israel in a positive light by promoting its international humanitarian aid and the generous hand it extends to the rest of the world through IsraAID organizations like Save a Child's Heart.

In applying for life insurance coverage, applicants are asked to fill out a form questioning their travel plans. Those who say they have travelled or are planning to travel to Israel, or to several other troubled nations, can see their application denied. Other countries affected in the same way include Afghanistan, Iraq, North Korea, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Syria.

Brown believes there are no hard data to warrant including Israel in a group of high-risk countries. "They haven't really gone through the number crunching to show there's a greater risk travelling to Israel," he said.

"The number of tourists in Israel who die is so small, it doesn't warrant change in insurance or a change in premium. To deny it is unfair."

Policy-holders who travel to Israel after filling out an application form saying they did not intend to do so risk voiding the policy and losing their coverage. Generally, insurers accept a policy applicant's statements on good faith, but if they learn someone travels to Israel a couple of times a year, they may refuse to honour the policy, even if that person dies in Canada. An insurer could argue the policyholder entered the insurance contract fraudulently and they are not obliged to pay the claim, he said.

> 'My biggest concern is that people are not able to protect themselves adequately'

Marlene Klassen, a spokesperson for Canada Life, said the company's approach to issuing policies "is consistent with that of the insurance industry and the practice of underwriting foreign travel in this manner has been in place long before 9/11.

"We adhere strictly to the foreign residence guidelines of our reinsurance companies, who research and update these guidelines several times per year. Political unrest is only one of the reasons contributing to substandard and uninsurable foreign travel and residency.

"The reinsurers use their experience as well as that of their worldwide reinsurance operations when compiling and updating their guidelines."

The companies also rely on government travel bulletins issued by western countries, including Canada, she said.

Suzanne Willers, a spokesperson for RBC Insurance, acknowledged the company's questionnaires ask about travel abroad during the previous and upcoming 12 months. "Apparently, it's an industry-wide standard and not unique to Israel."

The insurers examine "the risk associated with the travel destination" as well as the duration of the visit. However, even extended visits abroad need not lead to refusal to insure.

"Insurers would need more information" such as purpose of the stay, where they are staying, the means of transportation and similar questions, Willers said.

Brown said his firm had e-mailed more than half a dozen insurers requesting coverage. "We painted a scenario of someone planning to travel to Israel. The companies said 'no.'"

He suggested insurers could address the problem by either ignoring travel to Israel altogether or by including a rider in the policy specifically excluding pay- outs due to war risk while a policy holder is in Israel. Alternatively, they could increase the premium for Israel travel.

In New York, State Assembly speaker Sheldon Silver and other legislators are proposing a bill that would ban the consideration of travel in applications for coverage in the state. The move came after a Washington man was denied life insurance by Fidelity Investments because of two trips to Israel, the Jewish Week reported.

In 1996, a Brooklyn Assemblyman proposed similar legislation when two companies denied coverage to a man from the Bronx who was planning to spend a year of study in Israel. The companies reversed their rule and agreed to issue policies to Israel-bound travelers. The bill never came to a vote.

'We must not allow Gibson's film to be source of tension'

This is an excerpt from a statement issued by Canadian Jewish Congress "to our fellow Canadians of the Christian faith" in advance of this week's release of Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ.

"Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ, prior to its release date of Feb. 25, has generated much controversy over its potentially negative impact on the Jewish community and Christian-Jewish relations. At the same time, among Christians who already have seen this dramatic representation of Christ's Passion, there are those who have praised it and affirmed that it does not stir anti-Jewish feelings.

"The story the film depicts is at the core of the Christian faith and as Jews we are sensitive to both the profound meaning of the crucifixion for Christians and to how deeply the Passion engages their intellect and emotions. The subject matter of the film, however, also deals head on with events that are at the very root of the historic divide between Christianity and Judaism…

"Historically… what transpired at the time of Jesus is unclear. What is clear and significant specifically for Christian-Jewish relations is that the actualization of the deicide charge, flowing from some of the Gospel accounts and the perverse use to which these were put, has led over these two millennia to the immeasurable suffering of the Jewish people. It is this reality that worries Jews and Christians about Gibson's film.

"Admittedly, the state of Christian-Jewish relations in many countries, and certainly in Canada, has undergone a remarkable transformation for the better in the past few decades. We only have to look back over the earlier history of Canada, when two principal themes – the rejection of Jesus and the deicide charge – dominated Christian attitudes towards Jews, to appreciate how much things have evolved.

"Since the Second Vatican Council of the early 1960s, the founding in 1977 of the Canadian Christian Jewish Consultation (CCJC) and continuing through the pontificate of Pope John Paul II, Catholic-Jewish relations have progressed to a point one would not have believed possible two generations ago. Four documents dramatically reflect these changes in Canada: the Anglican Church's From Darkness to Dawn: Rethinking Christian attitudes towards Jews and Judaism; the United Church's Bearing Faithful Witness; the Roman Catholic Church's Renewing Our Common Bonds with the Jewish Community and the most recent, A Church Leaders' Letter against Anti-Semitism.

"These documents, among other things:

• Categorically reject the deicide charge: 'This calumny should never again be repeated.' (Renewing Our Common Bonds);

• Recognize and glorify Christianity's Jewish roots: 'Jesus was and always remained a Jew.' (Renewing Our Common Bonds); 'Understanding Torah must become an important undertaking for Christians, perhaps the most important biblical study.' (Bearing Faithful Witness); and 'We… are… deeply grateful for the Jewish roots of our faith traditions.' (Church Leaders' Letter);

• Abandon supercessionism (the notion that Christianity's advent negated God's covenant with the Jewish people) and affirm Judaism's vigour and inspirational power not only for its adherents but also for other believers: 'The Jewish people's… election and mission have a permanent validity and they play a decisive role in the religious history of humanity' (Renewing Our Common Bonds), and 'We…declare our unqualified gratitude for the gifts of the Jewish people to world civilization in general and Canadian society in particular.' (Church Leaders' Letter);

• Understand anti-Semitism and its roots and commit vigorously to fight for its eradication: 'We acknowledge with sadness and regret, and with no little shame, the historic burden of persecution, which Jews have borne throughout western history; a burden all too often inflicted by Christians, who have maligned Jesus' own people in Jesus' name,' and 'We challenge all churches, parishes, congregations and people of good will to find ways and means to expose and eradicate anti-semitism…' (Church Leaders' Letter); and

• Commit to pursue Christian-Jewish dialogue, for its own sake, but also as a means for tikkun olam, i.e. the repairing of the world: '… our common calling with Jews to align ourselves with God's world-mending work' (Bearing Faithful Witness).

"It is our hope and expectation that, apart from the central role The Passion of the Christ is to play in moving Christians and strengthening them in their faith, Gibson's film also will be used to foster greater mutual understanding and further demystification of Christian and Jewish beliefs. In other words, we must not allow the film to be a source of tension; we must translate it into an opportunity."

Illegal building in Jerusalem policitized: prof

By SARAH DOLGOY
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Illegal construction in Jerusalem has increasingly become an "epidemic," said an international and human rights law expert at McGill University Feb. 10.

In a lecture at McGill Law Moot Court sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee, Hillel Montreal and the McGill Jewish Law Students Association, Prof. Justus Weiner from Hebrew University in Jerusalem looked at how the phenomenon of illegal construction becomes politicized in the context of Jerusalem.

The terms "urban sprawl" and "illegal construction" generally produce images of poverty-stricken districts, but most illegal construction is not done "by poor people for poor people," he said.

Illegality, Weiner said, results from developers building without permits on land that does not belong to them without regard for overpopulation, the dispensation of services and the sustainability of both infrastructure and environment. Illegally built structures include additions onto previously legal residences, private homes and even luxury buildings.

When asked about the role of the Palestinian Authority (PA) in this situation, Weiner said they prioritize protecting land over ensuring "viability of the neighbourhoods." PA support for illegal construction has been proven by "a treasure trove of documents" found in the Orient House, PA headquarters, that show Arafat authorizing payments of fines for illegal buildings and reimbursements to individuals whose illegal property was demolished.

"Paying a fee for [legal] building permits" legitimizes Israeli government activity and reduces the potential political gains made through destruction of property, Weiner said.

A further problem he pointed out is that media outlets focus their cameras on the bulldozer, the crying family and the protesting NGO, leading many to believe demolitions are the norm. But the chances of illegal residences being knocked down are "almost nonexistent." Of the more than 1,000 illegal structures erected each year, only 30 to 35 are demolished. Structures slated for demolition tend to be on lands needed for other purposes, such as the expansion of schools or roads. Western Jerusalem does not escape this policy, as exemplified by the recent demolition of an illegally built addition to a synagogue. Personnel, money and political baggage for each instance where a demolition occurs have led city officials to "combine the cost of demolition with the cost of a public relations disaster," Weiner said.

Modifications over time to the permit process have made the system more accessible, resulting in a steady climb of applicants since the 1960s, he said. Of those who apply, 85 to 90 per cent of both Jewish and Arab applications are accepted. Still, since few sanctions have been brought down on those who break the law, the current atmosphere is one where "crime pays."

Currently, Weiner said, "illegal builders are squeezing out legal builders," which has a negative impact on legitimate Arab construction businesses.

"Arab landowners in Jerusalem are panicked [because] if the average person can buy for 20 cents on the dollar" they will be less likely to pay for legal housing. Jerusalem's municipal authority, having neither the means nor the political backing to deal with every case, has left Arab developers and landowners to use alternative methods such as advertisements in local newspapers to protect their interests.

Weiner said the focus on the "political dimension" of illegal building in Jerusalem has overshadowed the fact that it has great social ramifications. Unplanned development makes the provision of services difficult as municipal infrastructure cannot be developed for unauthorized community growth. The net real result of this trend of illegal construction is "an erosion of quality of life for the Arab population," he said.

גברים לעניין

עונה לו אסנת: "תעמוד בפרופיל ותסתכל בראי".

University of Calgary prof promotes Israel studies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Alan Dowty is that rarity of rarities in North American academia, a professor of Israel studies.

Last autumn, he inaugurated the Kahanoff chair in Israel studies at the University of Calgary. It is only the fifth university outside Israel to establish a chair and a program in Israel studies.

In addition, Israel studies programs are found at the University of Toronto, Brandeis University, Emory University and New York University.

Harvey Weingarten, the president of the University of Calgary, says the new program dovetails with its commitment to apply "the highest level of scholarship to the analysis and solutions of the significant societal problems facing the world today."

Dowty, an American who taught at the Hebrew University from 1964 to 1975, was lured to Canada from the University of Notre Dame.

Alan Dowty

"I am committed to teaching at least one semester each year for the next three years," he said. "Beyond that, the arrangement has been left open-ended."

An Israeli army veteran who was born in Ohio and grew up in Washington and Oregon, Dowty will teach a course on the Arab-Israeli conflict, one of his specialties aside from Zionist-Arab relations in the late 19th century.

Dowty, whose monographs and books also deal with the role of the great powers in the Middle East, wants to introduce a course on Israeli history and politics in the near future.

The advanced undergraduate course he is currently giving has 30 students, but none are Arabs or Muslims. "I hope this will change," he said.

No shrinking violet, he has initiated a "dialogue" with a Palestinian student group on campus to remove "suspicions" about the Kahanoff chair. (The chair is funded by the Kahanoff Foundation, a charitable organization set up by Calgary businessman Syd Kahanoff some 25 years ago.)

But it remains to be seen whether Dowty's efforts to enlist Arab students will be fruitful.

In the meantime, he has big plans. "We are planning to offer a master's degree that could be taken through various departments."

And he and his colleagues, including Shlomit Keren, a specialist in Israeli defence history and policy, intend to recruit doctoral students.

"We will also become the host institution in 2006 for the annual meeting of the Association for Israel Studies," disclosed Dowty, the vice-president of the AIS.

And the University of Calgary will be the home of the existing scholarly journal, the Israel Studies Forum.

Dowty, who is currently working on two textbooks on the Arab-Israeli dispute, believes that Israeli studies have been ignored by traditional Middle East studies programs and marginalized in Jewish studies departments.

"The reasons are clear: Israel studies are too controversial, too political, too contemporary. Apparently it will gain its rightful role in academia only by striking out on its own."

Regarding Middle East studies, Dowty says its "chilly attitude" to Israel is quite predictable, even understandable.

In a paper he delivered upon assuming the Kahanoff chair, he said, "Contrary to their cherished image, scholars are no less subject to sympathies and antipathies than are other mortals. Most Middle Eastern scholars focus on the Arab and Islamic worlds, and are sensitized to Arab and Islamic perspectives. In this alone there is nothing unusual or insidious."

Dowty, however, cannot abide theories in Middle East studies that deny "the very idea of objectivity" and thus legitimize "subjective opinion over fair and impartial scholarship."

As for Jewish studies, its lack of attention to Israel can be attributed to the newness of Israel studies.

As he put it: "There is a natural reticence to take on Israel, which is like taking a boisterous cousin to a tea party."

Israel studies, therefore, are "twice orphaned," Dowty noted.

Be that as it may, Dowty's case for Israel studies is compelling.

"The Arab-Israeli conflict is omnipresent in our media. The story of Israel's creation remains one of the more amazing epics of the 20th century.

"Israeli society offers a fascinating laboratory for social scientists who study social experiments such as the kibbutz, problems of mass immigration, the integration of diverse cultures, or clashes between religion and state.

"But interest in Israel has even deeper roots, in the very essence of Western civilization."

Nonetheless, he pointed out, Israel is the focus of innumerable studies by historians, political scientists, sociologists, anthropologists, economists and theologians.

Yet their work does not generally fall under the broad category of Israeli studies. "It is called history, political science, sociology, anthropology, economics and theology."

The field of Israel studies has two logical homes in academia. "In a broader geographic context, it fits into Middle Eastern studies, and in a broader cultural context, it should be at home in Jewish studies."

Having spent decades observing the Arab-Israeli imbroglio, he claimed that Israelis and Palestinians are realistically capable of reaching a rapprochement.

"Yes, if we look at the long-term trends in this conflict, and don't just focus on the violent events of the last three years, there is still very solid ground for optimism. We need to put things into perspective."

In his view, Israel and the Palestinians are heading toward a two-state solution, the current intifadah notwithstanding.

"It is still the only game in town. The world-weary critics who claim it is too late for a two-state solution have not even begun to cope with the enormous issues raised by a vision of an undivided Palestine that is neither Jewish nor Arab. Pretty words, but a chimerical idea."

Does Birthright Israel actually work?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Special Report

Johanna Herman is an exemplary alumna of Birthright Israel. Two months ago, the fourth-year art history student at the University of Toronto was named one of six international winners of the first annual "Charlie Award," recognizing Birthright alumni who have made a positive difference in their own communities in the field of Israel advocacy.

But before her trip in May 2002, Herman – who serves as Hillel at U of T's PR co-ordinator – was only minimally involved in Jewish campus life.

How typical is Herman? Proponents of Birthright, a free 10-day trip for young Jewish adults from 18 to 26 years old, say its impact on participants is huge.

Len Saxe, a Birthright Israel researcher and the director of the Cohen Center for Jewish Studies at Brandeis University, said that of the 40,000-plus participants surveyed by his team, only rarely do researchers hear that someone did not find meaning in the trip. "It just doesn't happen," he said.

Saxe's research includes interviews three months post-trip, as well as a year or more after returning from Israel. "We measure the impact in a variety of ways," he said. "How do they feel about being Jewish? How do they feel about Israel? About involvement in the organized Jewish community?"

Participants arrive for another Birthright Israel program in 2003.

More tangible differences include membership in Jewish organizations and participation in Jewish practices.

Compared to their peers who have not been to Israel, Birthright Israel alumni feel more positive toward Israel and see it as being more central, said Saxe. They are also "much more likely" to join their campus Hillel group, to attend religious services, and/or to take Jewish studies courses, even more than a year after returning home.

The effect is probably less dramatic for individuals already highly identified and engaged in the Jewish community – a description that likely applies to more Canadians than Americans, he added.

When asked about the effect Birthright had on her, York University student Pamela Heifetz's initial reaction was that it didn't have a major impact.

Yet she said she has considered spending an extended period in Israel at some point in the future, a possibility that never entered her mind before her trip three years ago.

As well, while Heifetz said her level of Jewish involvement hasn't changed since Birthright, she now understands her parents' preference that she marry someone Jewish.

"Seeing the unity of the community, the tradition and the need to carry it on – that made it more important," the fourth-year economics major said.

The trip is "an amazing opportunity," she said. "You can't pass it up. I knew a lot of people who had gone and had a fabulous time."

Saxe believes that gratitude for the trip is linked in part to the fact it's free.

The program, now finishing its fifth year, is a partnership between the Israeli government, Jewish philanthropists, North American Jewish federations and other Diaspora communities. Since its inception, almost 50,000 young adults have participated worldwide. Close to 7,000 of them are from Canada.

Birthright's future appeared uncertain earlier this year because of funding cuts from the Israeli government and the North American federation system, but last week a new grant of $7 million (US) from the Avi Chai Foundation, a private foundation based in New York and Israel, was announced. The grant will enable Birthright to more than double the number of slots available for this summer's tours.

Gil Troy, a McGill University history professor and a former Birthright skeptic, wrote in an August 2000 article in Moment magazine that the funders' gift set a powerful example of tzedakah and a commitment to klal Yisrael (the unity of the Jewish people).

Effects on Jewish identity range from subtle to dramatic, supporters say

In fact, he believes the gift aspect is central to the trip's success, fostering "a sense of community and adventure.

"The camaraderie amid such beneficence softened the participants," he wrote after heading to Israel as a Birthright staffer for the first time.

Almost four years and some half dozen trips later, Troy, who now chairs the Montreal Birthright Israel task force, is no less enamoured of the program. "It still is amazing," he said recently from his home in Montreal.

While he admits that some Birthrighters "fade into the woodwork" after the program, he's started to see what he calls "the Birthright bounce."

"When I look around at leadership on campus, at the Ghetto Shul [named for its location in the student ghetto near McGill University], or at pro-Israel rallies, again and again I recognize someone from the first or second Birthright. Again and again you see the degree to which Birthright has lit a candle among so many people."

On the other hand, he noted, he has "always warned against looking at Birthright as a magic bullet. It can only be part of a broader identity-building program."

See related story, page 33

"We always say, 'It's the beginning of your Jewish journey,'" said Liz Sokolsky, Toronto-based vice-president of education and operations for Birthright Israel. "The whole program is about getting [participants] in touch with a part of themselves they haven't before, and feeling a connection to their roots and to Israel."

Birthrighters span an age group that the Jewish world has neglected in the past, said Troy. "Studies have shown that people make critical decisions about marriage, career and family values in [their 20s], yet it tends to be a period in which they're most distant from family and religion."

Post-trip programming offers an outlet for returning participants who want to connect further, and it is increasingly recognized as an important aspect of the program.

"Montreal has been doing incredible work from Day 1 on post-programming," said Sokolsky.

In Toronto, a new staff position was created last year when Annie Raphael, herself a Birthright alumna, was hired as a post-program planner for alumni from the age of 23 to 26.

Raphael has noted that returning Birthrighters "feel the strongest connection within those first three months, and [during that period] they want to get involved and share their experience."

Alumni have called her office to volunteer within the Jewish community, make a donation, take Hebrew courses, find out how to become a trip leader and help organize reunion parties. There was a table of Birthrighters at a recent UJA Federation telethon, and the last alumni party attracted 1,100 people, Raphael said.

Tilly Shames of Hillel of Greater Toronto – which co-ordinates Birthright Israel trips for Jews aged 18 to 22 – is Raphael's counterpart, running post-Birthright programming for university-age students.

She said it's important that post-trip programming be done as soon as possible after students return. "If it doesn't happen immediately, kids fall through the cracks, and we lose an opportunity to build upon their Birthright experience by connecting them to the Jewish community at home."

While Shames said there are no expectations and no strings attached to the trip, she believes it's important to provide an opportunity for alumni who do want to become involved.

"It's very important that the madrichim share with the students that there are other Jewish students at home, and programming at home, that can keep them connected just like they feel [on the trip]."

Dana Bennie, a third-year psychology student at the University of Western Ontario, didn't just get involved with Hillel – where she now serves on the executive – following her Birthright experience last July. She also works for Birthright, recruiting others to go on the trip, and recently organized a Birthright trip geared for members of the Jewish fraternity AE Pi.

In addition, she credits her trip with inspiring her to become more religious. "I'm [also] thinking of going to Israel for a semester next year, which I wouldn't have thought of before."

One Canadian student, who declined to be quoted by name, told The CJN she was disappointed that on her Birthright Israel trip, a group photograph was taken with one of the major funders on Shabbat. Because she is an observant Jew, she did not join her peers for the photo. "I didn't get the Shabbat experience I really wanted."

Despite that, she said, the trip was positive, she did connect with Israel, and she realized that a lot of participants reconnected with their roots and their feelings about Israel. "I don't want to come across unappreciative. I tell everybody, 'Go. Go. It's great.'"

York student Justin Abrams said his trip last summer "definitely had an impact."

The second-year accounting student, who'd never been to Israel before, feels he now has a closer connection with the country. Although he stood up to vocal anti-Israel students before the trip, in retrospect, he says, "I didn't really have a connection [to Israel], so much, before."

He was particularly moved by time spent with his Israeli peers who are serving in the army. "You get a sense of what they're doing and sacrificing, and of why Israel is important."

Abrams, who says he has recommended Birthright to a lot of people, doesn't know anyone who says the trip is just "OK. They always say it's fantastic."

Sokolsky likes to tell the story of a student who returned from Birthright not quite sure of what it all meant or how it might have changed her.

"A couple of weeks later, she was sitting in class and a really cute guy walked into the room. She said to herself, 'I wonder if he's Jewish.'

"She had never asked herself that before. That's a fairly subtle effect, not something we'll be able to measure. But that's huge – and that's impact."

Some fair discussion on the fence

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Israeli government spokespeople are often criticized for being ineffective, especially compared to their Palestinian counterparts who always stay "on message" about the suffering and humiliation of their people under the "brutal occupation."

Of course, it's difficult to present a unified message in Israel's vibrant, even feverish, democracy. Still, there are effective spokespeople. One of the best is Daniel Taub, director of the general law and conflict-resolution division of Israel's Foreign Ministry. A brilliant young legal expert, Taub was also a debating champion during his days at Oxford University.

Taub was interviewed on Feb. 5 about Israel's security fence on the BBC's Hardtalk. Not only is this show known for its aggressive interview style, but it was guest-hosted by Lynne Ducet, a longtime BBC Mideast correspondent considered antagonistic by Israelis.

But Taub handled the challenge calmly. Ignoring interruptions from Ducet, he consistently made his point: Israel's security fence is a temporary security measure forced on Israel by the current Palestinian leadership's refusal to end terrorism.

"There's only one argument in favour of this fence," Taub said, "and that is that it works. We have a fence between Israel and the Gaza Strip and not a single suicide bomber has succeeded in crossing it. In those parts of the West Bank where the fence has been built, suicide bombings are down by the region of 30 per cent."

What made Taub all the more effective is that he explained Israel's perspective while also expressing sensitivity to the hardships the fence is causing some Palestinians. "Ugly as it is, problematic as it is, much as we have to try to mitigate its effects, there is no doubt that this fence is saving lives," said Taub. "Ideally we would like to find a security measure that has no impact on the lives of Palestinians. But that's not an option. So we have to weigh the right of Palestinians to have an unimpeded life with the right of Israelis to get on a bus and eat in a restaurant without being blown up."

On CBC Radio's The Current (Feb. 4) the case for Israel was effectively made by Dan Schueftan and CJN columnist Gerald Steinberg, two prominent Israeli academics.

The show's host, Anna Maria Tremonti, explored the issues surrounding Israel's security fence in depth, presenting a range of views. Guests included Jessica Montell, executive director of Israeli human rights group B'tselem, who was critical of the route of the barrier. But Steinberg and Shueftan were accorded substantial time to make their case in support of the fence.

Tremonti also interviewed Mordechai Kremnitzer, a professor of law at Hebrew University, about the Israeli Supreme Court's consideration of a petition to rule on the legality of the fence.

"Whichever way it decides," said Tremonti, "the highest court in Israel is well known for making powerful and controversial decisions." Kremnitzer agreed: "Yes, overall it is one of the institutions in Israel that deserves the highest record of confidence from the Israeli public."

This was a balanced, thought-provoking treatment of a controversial subject.

MP's comments condemned

"Moreover, the member's reference to concentration camps in the West Bank and Gaza is unacceptable. It makes a mockery out of the Holocaust.

"Though not a measure of choice, the security fence is a measure of necessity. Where built to date, the presence of the fence has resulted in a 30 per cent drop in suicide attacks," Eggleton said.

"This is not a land grab. This is a temporary security measure that could be undone once the Palestinian leadership lives up to its responsibilities. Simply put, no terror, no fence."

In a Feb. 4 question to foreign affairs minister Bill Graham, O'Brien called the barrier "illegal and inflammatory," and a "provocative incursion beyond the 1967 borders [that] makes the Palestinian people prisoners in their own towns."

He asked what action Canada would take.

Graham replied that Canada voted against the barrier at the United Nations. "We strongly support Israel in its security measures, but we believe that the construction of the wall and where it is going is such that it is inhibiting the peace discussions," he added. "It is a political solution. Canada's balanced position in urging the parties to this political solution makes a contribution to that process."

B'nai Brith Canada called on the "Liberal leadership" to "formally distance itself" from O'Brien on the issue.

In a statement, B'nai Brith expressed "shock and anger" and said O'Brien's comments "crossed the line and are totally unacceptable."

The fence is being built to save the lives of Jews as well as Christians and Muslims, "all of whom have been victims of the campaign of terror" being waged from the Palestinian territories.

"Not only is Mr. O'Brien abysmally ignorant of the facts regarding the fence, but he has attacked it in a manner that is extremely offensive and painful to Canadian Jews, particularly those who survived the evil of Nazi Germany," B'nai Brith Canada president Rochelle Wilner said.

Concordia board mulls swastika ban on campus

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Concordia University's board of governors will study a resolution that would prohibit all anti-Semitic "propaganda"on its campuses and make them "swastika-free zones."

The proposal was made by Noah Joseph, a student representative on the board. He presented the resolution at a board meeting last week in response to at least five anonymous anti-Semitic pamphlets that were found on the downtown campus during the fall semester, as well as an incident last year in which a student received no punishment for drawing a swastika on an Israeli flag.

The pamphlets have been described as hate propaganda against Jews by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, whose report on the matter was submitted to the board by Joseph.

Joseph had sought to have a vote on the resolution, but the board agreed, at the suggestion of one of its vice-chairs Rita de Santis, to refer the matter to the subcommittee that is reviewing Concordia's Code of Rights and Responsibilities. This code delineates what is considered acceptable behaviour by members of the university community.

"I'm satisfied the issue has been broached, but I would have preferred something had been done on the spot. I welcome the opportunity to look at the matter in depth and not just in a cursory way," said Joseph, who was co-president of Hillel last year.

The resolution would have Concordia ban the reproduction of the swastika on campus "other than in an academic or classroom context, or in the context of Holocaust education," as well as "prevent the dissemination of supremacist and anti-Semitic propaganda."

It also calls on rector Frederick Lowy to use "all means at his disposal," including the extraordinary powers he was given after the violent protest against former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's appearance on campus in September 2002 to "strongly and appropriately" punish any violators.

Concordia communications officer Chris Mota, who attended the meeting, said the board agreed that the use of the swastika is "inappropriate" and was "very accepting of the concept behind" [the resolution], but that the resolution was thought to be "too specific" in targeting only one image.

"One of the other student representatives, Adam Slater, raised the point that there is some discussion now on campus among Armenian and Turkish students about the Armenian genocide and what if there is an image that is offensive to them or to other groups, that they should not be forgotten, if a resolution is drafted," she said. Lowy also suggested that the board consider how all students can be protected from offensive images.

Mota said that, although the matter was on the meeting's agenda, Joseph's final draft of the resolution was "last minute" and not the same version the board had before it.

The board wants time to study the other material he submitted, she said.

De Santis, a lawyer, has agreed to listen to any party inside or outside the university on the matter.

Joseph and the League for Human Rights hope not to see a repeat of an incident last spring in which a student panel, in a 2-1 decision, let off student Laith Marouf for drawing a swastika on an Israeli flag at a pro-Israel event on campus. Marouf, a pro- Palestinian activist, argued that he drew an inverted swastika, which is associated with Hinduism, not Nazism.

The panel accepted his defence that his action was a political statement about Israel's treatment of the Palestinians and ruled that it did not constitute harassment under the university's Code of Rights and Responsibilities.

The League says the five pamphlets, copies of which have been submitted to the board, "target high-ranking Concordia administrators for criticism because they happen to be Jewish and allege a 'Zionist takeover' of the university."

They make claims about "racial and social engineering" in the admissions office against Arabs, Germans and other white males, the loss of "Christian values," and B'nai Brith being "sponsors" of Concordia.

One pamphlet depicts Concordia as a synagogue in which top officials hatch a scheme to develop "ethnic-focused genetic viruses" and refer to "gelt from the Shoah cow." Provost Jack Lightstone is called "Beria," an apparent reference to the infamous head of Josef Stalin's secret police.

There are also allusions to Jewish control of the media and the killing of Jesus, as well as imagery such as a Star of David on the Concordia crest.

None of them, however, has a swastika, said Yoni Petel, B'nai Brith's staff member responsible for campuses.

Petel said he does not believe the pamphlets are the work of pro-Palestinian activists.

Joseph said there has been a proliferation of swastika graffiti this year, especially in campus washrooms.

Petel said Concordia's board "should send a clear message that it acknowledges there is a problem, that it does not tolerate this type of hate speech, and that it has mandated its administration to deal with it."

B'nai Brith seeks hate charges against Arab paper

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada has asked Alberta attorney general Dave Hancock to investigate the Edmonton-based Alberta Arab News for willfully promoting hatred against Jews.

B'nai Brith also expressed concern that Canadian politicians, including a cabinet minister, placed ads in one of the offending issues of this publication.

The request for an investigation stems from a series of articles written by Greg Felton that were published in both the print and online versions of the paper. Some of the material in question was apparently re-published in a Vancouver-based Arab paper and has since been disseminated to a wider online audience, B'nai Brith says.

"The comments, which include Holocaust denial, are reminiscent of comments made by previously convicted hatemongers," David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada, said in a letter to Hancock.

"Tolerance and multiculturalism, the cornerstones of modern Canadian society, are threatened by the dissemination of the sentiments expressed in the offending articles," Matas wrote.

B'nai Brith alleges that among the statements published by the paper are several that refer to "Zionist" control over the media and government, and a description of the Holocaust as the religion of "Holocaustianity," with such phrases as "the fiction of Israeli/Jewish victimhood."

Attacks against Jewish organizations and individuals, including a Jewish cabinet minister, are also featured, B'nai Brith charges.

"We are very concerned that any Canadian Arab news outlet would publish or disseminate such articles," stated Rochelle Wilner, national president of B'nai Brith Canada. "We are disappointed that Canadian Arab leaders have not come forward to denounce this hate-filled material. It is time that leaders of the Arab community set an example and spoke out against this kind of inflammatory rhetoric."

Felton is described on a website devoted to his writing as an "award-winning investigative reporter and columnist on Middle East affairs" from B.C. who writes a media column for the bi-weekly Alberta Arab News.

In December, Felton wrote the following for the website Mediamonitors Network: "Given their influence in government and media, one would think that North American Zionists would feel rather contented. For example: Media and government both genuflect before the canonical verities of 'Israel's right to exist,' 'anti-Semitism' and 'the six million.'"

Earlier this month on his website, Felton attacked federal Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, saying his "history as a propagandist for Israel calls into question his ability to represent Canada's interests in cabinet."

A 1999 column by Felton in the Vancouver Courier that said "the tragedy for [Palestinian Authority president Yasser] Arafat is that Hamas' position is morally and legally correct" prompted Canadian Jewish Congress to issue a call for a boycott of the newspaper.

Felton is also described as the author of the upcoming book, Enemies by Design, "an examination of how and why anti-Arab/anti-Muslim propaganda drives U.S. Middle East policy."

CIC appoints new national chair and board

Marc Gold, former associate dean at Osgoode Hall Law School, has been appointed the new national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee(CIC). He is currently on the faculty at McGill University Law School and serves as vice-president of Maxwell Cummings & Sons Holdings Limited.

"I am gratified by the confidence expressed in me through this appointment and excited to lead an outstanding team of lay leaders and professional staff to contribute to the advancement of Canada-Israel relations and the pro-Israel agenda," Gold said.

"There is a new strategy being developed, a dynamic and enthusiastic board ready to implement it, and with CIJA [the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy], there is an important new structure to support the work of the CIC."

Gold will bring fresh leadership to the newly reconstituted board, said outgoing CIC chair, Joe Wilder, who will continue to serve as immediate past chair of CIC.

Gold has extensive community involvement. He is director of the Jewish Agency, chair of Montreal's Partnership 2000 project and a vice-president of United Israel Appeal Federations Canada and Montreal's FEDERATION CJA.

This is the first board comprised entirely of ad personam appointments, Gold said, and includes, also for the first time, a number of non-Jewish directors.

"CIJA's goal was to recruit the most talented group possible to lead the organization," said CIJA co-chair Brent Belzberg. "In Marc Gold, we have an outstanding individual to lead the board, and the new structure allowed us to reach out to extremely talented individuals willing to make a contribution, including Warren Kinsella, Donna Holbrooke and others who could not have played a central role in the CIC previously."

"In Israel, we have the most wonderful product to promote and the new board brings a wide range of unique talents with which to market it successfully to all Canadians," said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Little chance of major Israeli response to attack

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

You don't have to be a strategic wizard, or even a senior security official, to know that Israel will refrain from responding drastically to Sunday's attack on the number 14 bus in Jerusalem, just a day before the start of discussions about the security fence in The Hague.

Israeli spokespeople said Sunday the attack illustrates the need to complete the fence in Jerusalem quickly and also justifies Israel's position on the legal review of it.

Given the sequence of events, it would not be a propitious moment for scenes of a large-scale Israel Defence Forces operation in the territories to be broadcast around the world.

Even the chorus of right-wing politicians, which routinely calls for Palestinian Autority (PA) leader Yasser Arafat's expulsion after terror attacks, kept mum this time.

In the current climate, the main subject in consultations between Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz after the attack was security policy for the interim period stretching between the announcement of his separation plan, which would involve building the West Bank barrier and a unilateral withdrawal from Gaza, and its implementation. Over the next year, Israel will have to deal with Palestinian opposition to the plan.

Sunday's attack exposed Israel's dilemma: How is it to avoid showing weakness at a time when the public is waiting for withdrawal?

A senior Israeli official claimed Sunday that the separation plan provides Israel with more room to manoeuvre in the war on terror.

"When you're on the negotiation and road map track, you have to be much more restrained about reprisal policy, as happened when we had contacts with Abu Mazen," the official said, referring to former Palestinian prime minister Mahmoud Abbas.

"In contrast, when you're taking unilateral steps, you have much more freedom. But that doesn't mean you always have to take advantage of your freedom to act."

Security officials currently identify two problematic areas on the Palestinian side. The PA leadership seeks to undermine Sharon's plan, since American and European approval for unilateral withdrawal would compromise Arafat's position.

Meantime, Hamas and Islamic Jihad hope to be strengthened after an Israeli withdrawal. They anticipate that they will be seen as the forces that drove Israel from the territories, as in the case of Hezbollah and Lebanon.

Eight people were killed and more than 70 wounded on Sunday morning when a suicide bomber detonated an explosive device on a Jerusalem bus. [Israpet photo]

In addition to specific operations, as in Bethlehem (which has become a haven for terrorists), Mofaz and Sharon spoke Sunday about an integrated policy.

Israel will try to manoeuvre in the international community and convince world leaders to pressure the PA into living with the separation plan.

At the same time, Israel will make an intensive effort to stop Hamas and Islamic Jihad from gaining strength. Mofaz has appointed a special committee to co-ordinate this effort against Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Syrian overture

Israel has denied receiving a new peace overture from Syria. Officials made the denial after Syrian Vice-president Abdul Haim Khaddam said his country had made an offer via Turkey to restart peace talks that stalled in 2000. In the past, Israel has welcomed the idea of resuming negotiations, but has rejected any preconditions by Damascus.

Women at the wall

Construction has started on a prayer site for mixed-gender services at Jerusalem's Western Wall. The construction, next to Robinson's Arch, comes before an April deadline set by Israel's High Court of Justice to create such a space. The project, which is expected to be completed before then, has an estimated cost of $400,000 to $500,000 (US).

Rajoub boosts Sharon

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's peacemaking potential got a boost from PA President Yasser Arafat's security adviser. "Sharon is the only Israeli leader who can bring about peace if he is really sincere about it," Jibril Rajoub told Israeli reporters, adding that he was skeptical whether Sharon's plan to disengage unilaterally from the Palestinians could work. Rajoub also said Hamas will not take over if Israel withdraws from Gaza. "Though Hamas leaders declare that their movement will 'take over' the Gaza Strip in case of an Israeli withdrawal, the Palestinian people will not allow it," Rajoub said.

Red Cross blasts fence

The International Committee for the Red Cross condemned Israel's West Bank security barrier. The Swiss-based relief agency said that by building the fence, Israel has gone "far beyond what is permissible under international humanitarian law." Israel's ambassador in Geneva, Yaakov Levy, said the decision threatens to hurt relations with the relief organization. The Red Cross' announcement came days before the Feb. 23 hearing on the barrier in The Hague.

'Right of return' nixed

Morocco's foreign minister said it is "impossible" for Palestinian refugees to return to Israel. Speaking in Rabat to a visiting delegation of U.S. Jews from the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, Taib Fassi Fihri said Arab countries have to be realistic in their demands for a "right of return" for Palestinian refugees and their descendants.

Envoy endorses Gaza first

A top UN envoy and critic of Ariel Sharon called the prime minister's Gaza withdrawal plan "bold." Terje Roed-Larsen urged international support of Sharon's plan in remarks at a closed session Wednesday of the UN Security Council, Ha'aretz reported.

Fence makes two states impossible, Palestinians tell court

By TALI NIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

THE HAGUE — Opening the International Court of Justice's landmark hearings on the legality of Israel's West Bank barrier, the Palestinians' permanent observer to the United Nations said that the network of fences and walls would "render the two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict practically impossible."

Nasser Al-Kidwa also signalled the view that a ruling against Israel's West Bank fence could pave the way for international sanctions against Israel.

He said he hoped a non-binding ruling by the court could lead to the same kind of international action that followed the court's 1971 opinion that South Africa's occupation of Namibia was illegal. That decision led to sanctions against apartheid South Africa.

Al-Kidwa also told the 15-justice panel Monday that the fence, if completed, would leave Palestinians isolated in enclaves in only half of the West Bank.

Meanwhile, Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa told reporters at The Hague on Monday that his organization does not think the court's ruling will conflict with the U.S.-backed road map peace plan.

"We reject Israel's claims that the court ruling will contradict the road map," Moussa said. "In any case, the road map isn't working, and Israel doesn't honour it or implement its principles." He added the fence threatens any future agreement, requiring the international court to intervene.

Landmark hearing opens

Israel, which is staying away from the hearings, says the barrier stops Palestinian suicide bombers from infiltrating its towns and cities. The Palestinians say it is a veiled bid to annex occupied land they want for a state.

Some 200 pro-fence protesters demonstrated outside the courthouse building, under an arrangement in which Palestinians and other opponents of the wall will hold a separate demonstration later in the day.

"The wall is not about security. It is about entrenching the occupation and the de facto annexation of large areas of Palestinian land," al-Kidwa told the panel sitting at the Peace Palace in The Hague.

"This wall, if completed, will leave the Palestinian people with only half of the West Bank within isolated, non-contiguous, walled enclaves," he said.

Following an opening statement by the ranking justice, the first three hours were to be devoted to Palestinian arguments. These arguments will be followed by a presentation of facts linked to the construction of the fence by attorney Stephanie Khouri and Prof. James Crawford, the head of the international law department at the University of Cambridge. Prof. Ron Lowe of Oxford University will present the legal arguments.

In the afternoon, the court will hear arguments from representatives of South Africa, Algeria, Saudi Arabia and Bangladesh. The battle for public opinion will kick off outside the court at the same time in the form of various demonstrations.

Representatives of the ZAKA victims identification organization arrived early in the morning with the wreckage of Bus 19, which was blown up recently in a suicide attack in Jerusalem. The shell of the bus was placed outside the court as part of a mass demonstration in support of Israel.

Protesters will include terror victims, ZAKA representatives, solidarity delegations from Europe and more than 1,000 students from Israel, Britain, France, Germany, Holland and Poland. At the same time, the Christians for Israel organization will stage a quiet rally through the streets of the city bearing pictures of 927 terror victims.

"This is a day that will live in infamy," a kippah-wearing American protester shouted outside the courthouse, echoing the words of U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt following the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor that drew the United States into World War II.

The Palestinians have been given a permit to stage a counter-demonstration in the morning, with 25 activists only. Later in the afternoon, a second Palestinian demonstration is planned, with participants to include Palestinian Authority Ministers Saeb Erekat and Nabil Sha'ath, Israeli lawmakers Mohammed Barakeh, Ahmed Tibi and Issam Makhoul (Hadash), Palestinians affected by the fence, and support groups from Europe. The Palestinians intend to erect a symbolic fence outside the court gates.

Israeli activists have a permit to stage a counter-demonstration with no more than 25 people. Most members of the Israeli delegation, including 18 terror victims, arrived in The Hague on Sunday. Arnold Roth, who lost his daughter, Malka, in the attack on the Sbarro restaurant in Jerusalem, said the terror victims were in The Hague to express support for the fence that was likely to prevent further terror attacks.

Birthright Israel gets $7 million lifeline

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — A new grant of $7 million to Birthright Israel is breathing new life into the cash-strapped program, allowing it to more than double the number of slots available for this summer's tours.

The future of Birthright, which provides free trips to Israel for Diaspora young adults, was thrown into question recently as it became clear that its sponsors were not going to meet their financial commitments to the organization for 2004.

The major drop in funding came from the Israeli government, which reduced its funding for Birthright to a token amount due to budget constraints. That prompted Birthright to reduce its available slots this summer to 3,500.

Now, with a new "challenge grant" of $7 million (all figures US) from the Avi Chai Foundation, Birthright and Avi Chai are hoping the group of 14 Jewish philanthropists who helped launch Birthright will match the Avi Chai grant.

Already, the group has notified its trip providers that it will now be able to bring 8,200 young Jews to Israel this summer.

Avi Chai officials said foundation members felt compelled to contribute the money to make up for the Israeli government's drastic slash in funding. Founded in 1984, Avi Chai is a private foundation that funds educational programs.

We "believed it was unfortunate for the program to have to suffer a significant reduction in the number of participants just as Birthright was reaching full strength," the foundation said in a news statement.

Birthright officials reacted to the announcement with delight.

"We are extraordinarily grateful to Avi Chai, in whom we have great respect," said philanthropist Michael Steinhardt, one of Birthright's founders and principal funders.

Steinhardt said the foundation agreed to become a Birthright philanthropic partner and is planning to give an additional $1 million per year for each of the next five years of the program.

When Birthright was launched, the three major sponsors of the program – the Israeli government, a group of Jewish philanthropists and the North American Jewish federation system – agreed to divide evenly the funding for the $210 million, five-year program.

Each party originally committed to contributing $70 million for the first five years. However, Israel cut its funding this year to $400,000, from $9 million the previous year, citing severe budget constraints.

Compounding Birthright's financial woes, the federation system now plans to pay a total of only $35 million, of which it is currently short $4 to $5 million, officials say. As a result, the Jewish Agency for Israel, the overseas partner of the United Jewish Communities federation umbrella group, has increased its contribution to the program to make up for the shortfall.

Since Birthright began, the program has brought some 60,000 Diaspora youth between the ages of 18 and 26 to Israel for free 10-day guided trips of the country. For many, it is their first trip to Israel. Only youth who never before have been on a peer tour of the country are eligible to participate.

The ambitious program has been hailed as a revolutionary way to help infuse Diaspora youth with a strong Jewish identity, a sense of connection to Israel and the drive to connect with their own Jewish communities back home.

Before last week's announcement of the $7 million grant, Birthright's future seemed uncertain.

Although Birthright took 10,000 young Jews to Israel this winter, including 8,000 from North America, the program was forced to turn away thousands more who were eligible because of a funding crunch, program officials said.

In its statement, Avi Chai said it wants to be a partner with the philanthropists backing Birthright Israel for the next five years and said it was awaiting word from the Israeli government on future commitment to the program.

Avi Chai also said foundation members hoped the Jewish federations in North America and Europe would fulfill their pledge to provide one-third of the program's funding.

Simon Wiesenthal knighted

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Britain's Queen Elizabeth II has awarded an honorary knighthood to Simon Wiesenthal, 95, the legendary Nazi-hunter who tracked down more than 1,000 war criminals, including Adolf Eichmann.

"An honorary knighthood is a rare honour for the Queen to bestow, a special award for a very special man," said John Macgregor, Britain's ambassador to Austria, where Wiesenthal lives.

Announcing the award on Feb. 19, British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw praised Wiesenthal's "untiring service to the Jewish communities in the United Kingdom and elsewhere by helping to right at least some of the awful wrongs of the Holocaust."

Lord Greville Janner, chairperson of Britain's Holocaust Educational Trust, said, "No one in this world deserves it more than he."

Describing Wiesenthal as "one of the great people of this world," Janner said it is appropriate for Britain to honour him "not least because we have a community here who suffered as a result of the activities of the people he has tracked down."

The award will be given to Wiesenthal in Vienna later this year.

Israel primed for next development stage: economist

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As Israel slowly pulls itself out of two years of debilitating recession, economist Simon Benninga has his gaze set on the future direction of the country's economy.

And the next stage he foresees is the same controversial development familiar to observers of other advanced economies: internationalization.

"We have a lot of human capital, financial capital and an industrial infrastructure, but if companies really want to grow, they have to move offshore," he said.

"Israel's internal market is not big enough to support major industry activity."

Speaking to The CJN during a brief visit to Toronto, Benninga acknowledged that Israel has already become "export-oriented." But to further its economic development, he suggested the country model itself after another smallish nation that has achieved remarkable economic success thanks to a capable work force, access to capital and despite a modest domestic market.

"Holland looks a little like Israel," he said. Dutch companies such as Unilever, Royal Dutch/Shell, Philips and Akzo Nobel have become successes by going global, and he sees no reason Israel's economy should not develop in the same way.

Already many Israeli corporations have become world leaders in their fields. Benninga sits on the board of ELCO Industries, the largest supplier of "white goods" (washing machines, refrigerators, stoves and air conditioners) in France. It once was in the transformer business, but responded to market forces and turned itself into a consumer durables company. Its products are outsourced and made in China, he said.

"Markets are there to decide what works for them. It's not easy, but to be a world class producer of white goods, you won't have production in Tel Aviv," he said.

Delta, a textile maker that is one of Marks and Spencers' main suppliers, has outsourced much of its production to factories in Jordan and Egypt, he noted.

On the other hand, certain high tech industries can be located in Israel. Checkpoint, for instance, a world leader in firewall software, requires the technical sophistication of developers who work in Tel Aviv, he said.

During his Toronto visit, Benninga presented his analysis of the Israeli economy to a meeting of the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University (TAU). Benninga, who was born in Holland but raised in North Carolina, is dean of the faculty of management of the Leon Recanati Graduate School of Business Administration at TAU. Earlier, Benninga addressed the Asper School of Business at the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg.

Israel's economy has made significant strides since he immigrated in 1969, he said. Even in the 1970s and 1980s, agriculture formed a major component of the state's economy, while diamonds were also important. Both are still significant export earners, but competitors in northern Africa and South Africa have displaced much of Israel's famed Jaffa orange market. Diamond cutting and polishing has been outsourced to India, though the Tel Aviv bourse remains an important centre for exchange, with hundreds of Indian nationals accredited to the exchange.

The shift from traditional industries, due to "the liberalization of the economy," has taken place gradually over the past 25 years in Israel, he said.

In its early days, the state was modelled on the ideas of its eastern European socialist founders. At one point, the Histadrut, the giant labour federation, controlled some 50 per cent of the economy through its ownership of banks, bus companies, kibbutzim and health insurers. "That's all fallen apart," he said.

In 1969, Israel had a fixed exchange rate, a small capital market and government involvement in much of the economy. Privatization has taken hold since then, as many Israelis trained in western economics took prominent roles in the country's policy-making apparatus.

Moreover, many of Israel's immigrants were more entrepreneurial than its founders, and they pushed the economy towards a market orientation. Iraqi Jews, he pointed out, favoured small business and much of the accounting profession consists of Iraqi immigrants.

Israel's security needs continues to cost the government "tons of money," but a beneficial side effect has been that much of the high tech industry owes its success to the demand created by the defence establishment and the skills brought by military veterans now working in the private sector.

So where does the focus on high tech leave the less educated elements of Israeli society?

Benninga acknowledges that the shift to a knowledge-based economy is painful and disruptive, but high tech companies such as Intel, which has a substantial presence in Israel, also employ low tech workers.

"Not all [of Intel's] employees are doctors and engineers," he said.

Return to growth predicted for 2004

By GAIL LICHTMAN
Israel Press Service

JERUSALEM —After three years of recession, 2004 is shaping up as the year for economic recovery in Israel.

Predictions are for an encouraging 2.5 per cent growth in Gross Domestic Product (GDP), increased exports and a recovering high-tech industry. Inflation, too, is expected to be within the government's target range of 1 to 3 per cent, tourism is on the rebound, and the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange and Israeli financial markets have been on a bull run.

U.S.-born Gil Bufman, Bank Leumi's senior vice-president and chief economist, is a cautious optimist. A former senior economist in the Bank of Israel's monetary department and a consultant to the Ministry of Finance, he says it's necessary to go back to 2001 to understand the causes of Israel's recession and the reasons for the current optimism.

"There were four main recession triggers," Bufman explains. "Two of these were external factors and two were domestic. The external factors were the crash of global high tech demand in the second half of 2000 and the global economic slowdown and recession, especially after 9/11. The domestic factors are the security situation beginning in late 2000 and the loss of government economic policy credibility in late 2001 and 2002."

The security situation led to reduced confidence among consumers and business owners. Businesses and investors postponed investments or improvements, and consumers stayed away from malls after terror attacks. "This all had a very negative impact on domestic demand," he says.

During this period, the government was sending very unclear messages about such things as the budget, taxes and interest rates. As a result, Israel's financial markets began to lose stability, the shekel underwent relatively rapid depreciation and inflation shot up in the first half of 2002.

In 2003, the seeds of recovery were sown. The global economy started to stabilize, which had a positive impact on Israel's foreign trade, and the government crystallized its economic policy. This gave Israelis "a very clear view of where economic policy is headed," Bufman says.

In addition, the sharp depreciation of the shekel greatly improved the real exchange rate, making the shekel more competitive and enabling Israeli firms to compete better on world markets. "The last time the shekel was as competitive as it is now was in the late 1970s," says Bufman.

As well, the recession forced Israeli firms to become more efficient, and while productivity has grown, labour costs have decreased, further boosting competitiveness.

"My feeling is that improvement in competitiveness is going to show up in increased exports in 2004-2005," Bufman says. "Export-led growth boosts economic activity. It draws the attention of foreign investors and helps create an inflow of foreign currency.

"We are going to see more and more investors considering investing in Israel – not just financial investments but also long-term strategic investments in Israeli companies. The leading candidates for these investments are likely to be in the high-tech sector. However, other lower technology parts of the manufacturing sector, financial services and infrastructure projects may see a surge of foreign interest."

With respect to inflation, substantial interest rate reductions over the past year – from 9.1 per cent in December 2002 to 4.85 per cent in February 2004 – should only mildly influence prices after a gradual increase in demand.

"In my opinion, 2004 seems to be the year in which high tech will join the mid -and low tech sectors [such as chemicals and foods] in recovery," Bufman says.

Even so, the GDP growth will probably not be enough to substantially lower Israel's unemployment rate. "Only when firms feel that the growth they are seeing is an ongoing affair will we see the beginning of recovery in unemployment. I anticipate the first signs of improvement in the unemployment picture only towards the end of 2004."

The security situation is still a problem, Bufman says, "but there are enough alternative positive factors in the pipeline that will help the Israeli economy return to growth. However, without a stable security situation, it is going to be difficult for the economy to fulfill its full economic growth potential of some 5 to 6 per cent… annually."

Tourism, plunged in 2001 and 2002 due to the intifadah, started to experience a comeback in 2003 with a 25 per cent increase, to one million – a little over one-third of the peak year of 1999. "While there was a recovery, it is important to remember that the base numbers of 2002 were extremely low and the absolute numbers of tourists coming to Israel are still much lower than in peak years," Bufman says.

The Israeli stock market and other financial markets did very well in 2003, with the Tel Aviv-100 Index rising by close to 70 per cent in dollar terms. The Tel-Tech-15 (the 15 largest high-tech companies traded on the Tel Aviv exchange) rose by almost 130 per cent in shekel terms and Israel's long-term bond index had a return of 37 per cent.

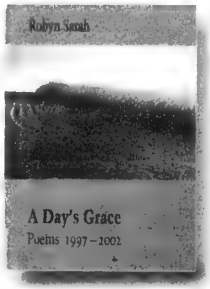
Robyn Sarah's poems are profoundly moving

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

When we were young and knew a great deal and were inclined to read poetry, we often asked ourselves: What does this poem mean?

When we were older and knew that we did not know a great deal, we understood that what a poem means is less important – indeed, if important at all – than how a poem makes us feel.



Poetry, we eventually learned, is the recreation of experiences. Like a carpenter who cobbles and clips disparate pieces of wood into a perfect final shape, a poet uses images, sound, rhythm and cadence to assemble his words into a song.

Of course, a poem may convey a certain meaning to a reader, but it need not have a specific meaning to convey. It will, however, convey feelings, sensations and ideas.

There are many skilled poets in Canada. Unfortunately, we are not sufficiently familiar with them.

One Canadian poet with whom readers should become more familiar is Robyn Sarah.

Sarah, who was born in New York and raised in Montreal, is the author of numerous collections of poetry and two collections of short stories. Her most recent book is A Day's Grace: Poems 1997-2002, published by The Porcupine's Quill last year. Accept My Story, from her short story collection Promise of Shelter, won a National Magazine Award and was shortlisted in Best American Short Stories 1994. The collection itself was shortlisted for the Hugh MacLennan Prize.

Sarah studied music at the Conservatoire du Quebec and philosophy and English at McGill University. She also taught English for 20 years at a local community college.

She is a very skilled writer. Her skills are in evidence on every page of A Day's Grace.

The reader is stopped immediately by the poet's dedication of her book to the memory of her father who died at the young age of 30, when Sarah was only four, and who, in Sarah's words, was "cut down in the waxing of his days."

The sad melancholy of the child's lament for the father she barely knew shivers the reader. That the effect is achieved with such economy of words is masterful.

Here as I pause to greet the day
And raise the sun-flushed blind,
The thought of you, I know not why, comes stealing to my mind.

Of you who fathered me, I know
Not more than I am told,
I did not seek your inner self
When I was three years old.

Only the lines your pencil wrote
In little bursts of shine
Remain to tell me that your thoughts
Ranged the same roads as mine.
(August 1964)

The way the poem ends is evocative of the emotion-stirring ability of another Montreal poet, A.M. Klein.

Sarah has compiled some 53 poems in the collection, each of which offers her unique, personal insights into the human condition. She has the rare ability to capture the poignance of a sigh in words.

Below are two poems about poetry. In each, we experience a different nuance of the significance of poetry in Sarah's life.

Poem

A poem is a small machine to move the heart.
Set it at 'start'
and let it shift the mind
from one plane to another.
When the heart's a heavy stone the mind can't hope to lift alone,
slip it between.
The poem is a lever.

Vidui

Poetry is my firepan. In it
I offer up my smoking heart in words that burn and give off a sweet savour.

If this my only service be unacceptable unto the One Who heareth prayer, alas! what will become of me?

We understand that both these poems are a form of prayer, words of the heart. In the former, the poem acts upon the self; in the latter, it is intended to act in higher realms.

Sarah's work is profoundly moving and deserving of a wide audience.

There are many other worthy Canadian poets. The following collections have recently been published by Guernica Press.

• Borrowed Light by Merle Nudelman. This is the Toronto poet's first book of published poems.

• At the Moonbean Café by Malca Litowitz. Litowitz, also living in Toronto, is an award-winning poet. This is her second published collection.

Both Nudelman's and Litowitz's poetry have been published in The CJN.

• Mask by Elana Wolff. This is a unique collection of poems dedicated to Charlotte Salomon, a young Jewish artist from Berlin who died barely past her teenage years in Auschwitz. Mask is Wolff's second collection of poetry.

• Behind the Blue Gate by Carol Rose was first published in 1997. These poems by the Winnipeg author are a rich, sensual paean to her experiences in Israel.

TORONTO ARTIST TURNS ELIJAH'S CHAIR INTO VIDEO ART, WEDDING CANOPY INTO MOVIE SCREEN

Several Passovers ago, Toronto-born artist Melissa Shiff wanted to raise awareness of the plight of the homeless in New York, so she staged an elaborate "Matzah Ball Soup Kitchen" on 42nd Street near Times Square, complete with a "matzah wall of oppression" and a chair for Elijah the Prophet rigged to display video images of doors on its backside.

"There's a line in the Haggadah that says, 'Let all who are hungry enter and eat,'" said the 37-year-old conceptual artist and social activist. "I took that as a mandate to invite all who are hungry in New York to come and have a bowl of chicken soup at the Matzah Ball Soup Kitchen."

Although the street installation has long since closed, her Elijah's Chair is on display at the Jewish Museum in New York until the end of Passover.

Instead of a large imposing throne, Shiff offered Elijah a smaller rocking chair "because I wanted to subvert the throne and make it more of a feminine structure," she said. "It's taking messianicity and changing it, because messianicity is rooted in the patriarchal structure and I wanted to feminize it, make it more of an object associated with the female."

Images of the Torah were projected onto Melissa Shiff and her husband's bodies as they walked down the aisle last Oct. 12 in Toronto.

The chair's looping video display of "endless doors opening" is meant to suggest the endless opportunities that exist for helping others. It consists of actual images of doors of Jewish facilities and homes around New York belonging to both the rich and the poor. "The hope is that one of those doors will lead you out of Mitzraim [Egypt] and into social action," she explained.

Shiff grew up in Toronto, earned a fine arts degree in Boston, lived in New York, and recently moved back to Toronto to get married. "I reinvent Jewish rituals as an artistic practise," she said in explaining her philosophy.

Her inventiveness regarding Jewish rituals extends even to her marriage. Images of the Torah were projected onto her and her husband's bodies as they walked down the aisle last Oct. 12 in Toronto's Distillery district in the first wedding known to have been performed in those historic premises. During the ceremony, the chupah was transformed into a movie screen.

The whole production was videotaped and Shiff has made a short film of it, which she has entered into the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. Her husband is Louis Kaplan, a professor of history and theory of photography at the University of Toronto.

Musical examines case of John Demjanjuk

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

It started as a poem. When Jonathan Garfinkel heard about John Demjanjuk – the Cleveland autoworker accused of being Treblinka's Ivan the Terrible – he penned some verse and read it at a 1999 Saskatchewan writers conference.

A Ukranian writer approached him and warned, "This is dangerous stuff, tread carefully."

With that in mind, Garfinkel reworked the poem into a play, The Trials of John Demjanjuk: A Holocaust Cabaret, which opens March 2 at Harbourfront Centre Studio Theatre and runs until March 7.

Garfinkel hopes the short run will cast a long shadow.

"The audience will ask themselves how human beings are capable of doing this, and bigger questions like 'What is evil?'"

The play doesn't shy away from the controversial elements of Demjanjuk's story, Garfinkel says. "The trials provoked controversy and I want to show that controversy, not hide it."

In 1986, Demjanjuk was extradited to Israel after a U.S. Federal Court had earlier ruled that he was Ivan the Terrible, a notoriously ruthless gas chamber operator at Treblinka. In 1988, he was found guilty and sentenced to death. However, the Israeli Supreme Court overturned the conviction in 1993, saying that reasonable doubt existed as to the identity of Ivan the Terrible.

Demjanjuk returned to the United States, only to face new charges in 1999. Two years ago, a U.S. Federal Court in Cleveland stripped him of his U.S. citizenship, ruling that he served the Nazi regime at four concentration camps. Today, Demjanjuk is appealing the verdict, insisting his innocence.

These courtroom battles flesh out the production, which is framed as a cabaret-style musical. Garfinkel calls the music, "Klezmer meets Brecht."

Directed by Jennifer Herszman Capraru, the play features Frank Moore as Demjanjuk, Christine Brubaker as the long-legged German narrator, and Dmitry Chepovetsky as Ivan the Terrible.

Chepovetsky, a Ukranian Jew, says this role will be his most difficult.

"I have to get into the skin of someone so murderous and sadistic and unremorseful. For me, that's being on the other side." Chepovetsky has played Jewish characters of late, most notably Joseph in Jason Sherman's Torah-based Remnants last fall.

Chepovetsky and the other actors don't relay judgments or lessons. "The great thing about this script is that is makes the audience form their own opinions," he says.

As serious as the subject matter is, a lighter side glimmers through. "There are humorous elements, but it's more of uncomfortable laughter," Garfinkel says.

The play has hit the stage before, having been workshopped at the Ashkenaz Festival and at the Rhubarb! Festival two years ago. The full 90-minute version also garnered attention last May in Banff and Ottawa.

Those who saw previous Toronto productions of The Trials can expect a more thorough version. Demjanjuk's court appeal and the two lawyers' deepened relationship receive ample stage time this time around.

Garfinkel, who also wrote Walking to Russia, publishes poetry in literary journals across Canada, and it's no surprise that verse peppers The Trials. One Holocaust survivor on the stand tells Demjanjuk: "The night of the rebellion, I made off with your eyes, stitched them into the wallet of my skin."

MUCH ADO ABOUT SOMETHING: ENGLAND'S BARD RETURNS TO HAMPTON COURT

The Shakespeare Globe Theatre in London performs three Shakespearean works in the Great Hall of Hampton Court Palace this July in celebration of the anniversary of William Shakespeare's debut performance before King James I at Hampton Court Palace in 1604.

Three of the bard's most famous works – Romeo and Juliet, Much Ado About Nothing and Measure for Measure – are scheduled for performance in the Stuart court where Shakespeare trod the boards for the British monarch four centuries ago.

Still counted as one of the Queen's royal houses, Hampton Court Palace and its 60 acres of famous gardens offer a living tapestry of more than 500 years of royal history. The palace was home to kings and queens from Henry VIII to George II.

Shakespeare Globe artistic director Mark Rylance credited Historic Royal Palaces, the non-profit trust that conserves Hampton Court Palace, for giving the public the opportunity to "explore together a true, original playing space of Shakespeare's day." Tickets cost as much as $115 US or as little as $30 (standing). Website is www.hrp.org.uk.

Israeli Tourism on Upswing: Jerusalem's Inbal Hotel (formerly the LaRomme) expects to achieve 70 per cent occupancy this month, a figure far above the national average and far above the 22 per cent occupancy rate it experienced in February 2003.

The statistic offers a telling snapshot of the significant resurgence evident in Israel's ailing tourism industry. However, the Inbal's February numbers may be somewhat inflated due to the unusually high number of groups the hotel welcomed since the end of January.

First there was Diaspora Affairs Minister Natan Sharansky's Global Forum Against Anti-Semitism, followed by some board meetings of the European Jewish Congress. Then came 300 rabbis from the Rabbinical Assembly of the American Conservative Movement as well as dignitaries from the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, who wrapped up four days of meetings with a gala dinner attended by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

The next major group to arrive was the Consistoire Central de France, followed by a group of Makuya pilgrims from Japan. Israel's economy depends on a steady stream of tourists and visitors. Recognizing this, many of Israel's friends are deciding to proceed with travel plans they had previously postponed.

Portuguese-Jewish Heritage: Walk in the footsteps of your Portuguese Sephardi ancestors with members of Saudades Sefarad, Kulanu and Root & Branch, who have organized a second conference tour to Portugal, April 18 to 28. Itinerary includes visits to Belmonte, Lisboa, Covilha and Porto, and a cruise on the Douro.

"Don't miss this opportunity of joining us in this reunion of celebration together with the tenacious and brave souls of Portugal who retained their Jewish consciousness through 500 years of persecution," says tour co-organizer Rufina B. Silva Mausenbaum of Johannesburg, South Africa, director of Saudades Sefarad. Contact her at rufina@netactive.co.za or visit the website www.saudades.org.

Jewish China: Brian Stein of Toronto's East West Travels is the guide for a 15-day "Shang-Chai" tour of Jewish China that departs on May 10.

The tour "celebrates the life that China has given Jews over the centuries," according to Stein, who shares guiding duties with Regent China guides and Judaic scholars in China.

In Beijing, the group enjoys a Sabbath service and dinner with Kehillat Beijing. After exploring the bustling metropolis, they travel to Harbin and view architecture left by the Russian Jews who came there in the late 19th century; Stein says he is unaware of any other Jewish itinerary that includes Harbin.

In addition, the group visits the formerly thriving Jewish community of Kaifeng and meets a Chinese family of Jewish descent. They also view the famous Terra Cotta warriors of Xi'an and enjoy a second Shabbath service and dinner in Shanghai, where Jewish historic sites include the Ohel-Moishe Synagogue and the Hongkou Ghetto. The last stop is Suzhou, the garden city sometimes called the Venice of the East.

The land portion of the trip costs $2,595 (US); the single supplement is $555. A Chinese visa must be purchased from a Chinese consulate or embassy prior to departure. Payment deadline is March 10. Brian Stein, 416-961-8234 or brian@eastwesttravel.ca

Play explores lives of children of Holocaust survivors

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Children of Holocaust survivors feel helpless when their parents talk to them about the horror of the war, because they are unable to revisit the past, says Robert Majzels, a playwright, novelist and Governor General Award-winning translator.

"The horror has been communicated by their parents, but [the children] can't do anything about it."

The son of two Holocaust survivors, Majzels, 53, says children of survivors are keenly aware of the gap in their family history, of "a huge absence" that comes from growing up without grandparents, cousins or other relatives. "It was as though your family began yesterday," he says.

In his prize-winning play This Night, Majzels explores the predicament of the children of survivors, the "second generation," and how their parents' experiences during the Holocaust continue to affect them into adulthood.

Presented by the TEATRON theatre company, This Night opens at the Berkeley Street Theatre on March 3 and runs until March 20, with a preview on March 2.

The play features David Rosser as Benny and Jack Kennedy as David, two children of a Holocaust survivor. Benny is a successful businessman and David, his younger brother, is a rebel who became a political and union activist.

Over the course of an evening, Benny and David attempt to come to terms with their own lives through the memory of their dead father.

Ari Weisberg, director of This Night.

This Night took first prize at the 1994 Canadian Jewish Playwrighting Competition and at the 1991 Dorothy Silver Awards in Cleveland. During a discussion there, which followed a reading of the play, Majzels remembers that an audience member, a woman about his age and the child of a survivor, was in tears when she stood up to speak.

"I had so much in common with her," he says on the telephone from his home in Montreal. "I realized that what I was describing wasn't just what I felt – it was a wider phenomenon."

But Majzels says This Night is about more than the dilemma of Jewish children with parents who are Holocaust survivors.

"We are all survivors of the Holocaust," he says. "What happened to the 20th century, the failure of western civilization, is a legacy we have to contend with."

What went wrong in the post-Holocaust world and why we still haven't got it right is one of the subtexts of the play. It's a play that lends itself to discussion, Majzels says, and doesn't give any easy, "this is it" answers.

'A thinking play'

This Night director Ari Weisberg calls it "a thinking play." Last spring, at performances of a workshop production of This Night at Hamilton's Theatre Aquarius, they "nearly had to kick people out" of the theatre each night, he says, because the play is so thought-provoking.

For the upcoming Berkeley Street Theatre run, TEATRON offers after-show discussions with the cast and crew on Mondays and Thursdays. The playwright will attend the March 15th post-show talk.

Weisberg chose This Night, TEATRON's premiere production, from the plays that have won the Canadian Jewish Playwrighting Competition.

"It stood out from the rest," he says. "This play is all action. It doesn't have passive storytelling, when you have a narrator fill you in on details and the background. All the things you need to know come in dialogue, which makes it such a dynamic play."

TEATRON (Hebrew for "theatre") is committed to producing new Canadian Jewish plays, to education and to promoting Jewish values to the entire community, goals that are "particularly important in these days, when anti-Semitism and racism are again raising their ugly heads around the world," Weisberg says.

Formed in 2002, TEATRON is a professional theatre company that is shomer Shabbat and will thus give observant actors the opportunity to work, Weisberg says. "In today's professional situation, some actors can't work because they don't perform on Shabbos."

In keeping with its mandate of promoting Jewish tradition, history, philosophy and way of life, TEATRON begins the March 6 performance of This Night early with a Purimspiel festival and a reading of the Megillah.

Evening performances of This Night start at 8 p.m., and matinee performances, on Wednesdays, begin at 1:30 p.m. For tickets, $19 to $32, call 416-368-3110. Group purchases and special promotions are available.

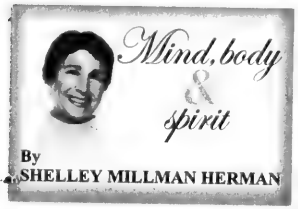
Timeless wisdom from Maimonides, Part II

The wisdom of our forefathers continues to influence and guide us. It can be used as a mainstay of support. It provides us with a strong foundation and helps us plot our future direction. It is important to look back to history in order to move forward with insight, knowledge and understanding.



By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

In this article, I will continue to impart the brilliance of the Rambam, also known as Maimonides. Maimonides was a prominent scientist, an exceptional medical doctor and an extraordinary Torah scholar. He lived 800 years ago, yet his expansive medical expertise earned him the title of "father of modern medicine." Known to be a man of remarkable personal refinement, the inscription on his tombstone aptly reads "elite of mankind."

The Rambam lived by the principle that man's body and soul are one inseparable entity, and his belief that "a healthy, whole body is part of the pathway to knowing God" pervades his writings.

His teachings on health and wellness are timeless, continuing to hold relevance today.

Some of his basic principles, including (translated) direct quotes, are:

- The Rambam was a strong proponent of the "golden mean" – not going to either extreme – and he provided guidelines for living a life of balance and moderation with regard to eating, drinking and using medicines.
- He was the forefather of preventive medicine and he lived by the principle that "one must take care of his health before he becomes ill."
- "While it is impossible to prevent aging entirely, it is possible to slow down the process. Good nutrition, bathing, healthy sleep and light daily walks will all retard aging."
- "Most illnesses, including serious ones, are caused by poor, defective digestion. Food that is not digested properly will cause progressive damage to the organs. Poor digestion is a result of four problems: the quantity of food, its quality, eating in the wrong order and eating at the wrong time."
- The Rambam believed that one should always eat when seated, and that the composition of the food is not the only consideration – "the setting, and one's frame of mind when eating are also important, as these will impact the digestive process."
- "One should not eat to satiety; instead he should omit one-quarter of the amount needed for complete satisfaction. One should avoid excessive eating because gluttony is poison and the cause of all illness."
- "One who eats slowly will enjoy longevity."
- The Rambam believed that the consumption of meat should be reserved for Shabbat and holidays and that it was otherwise an indulgence.
- "Meals should only be eaten after engaging in exercise or other activities which cause a slight increase in body temperature." After eating, one should be calm and relaxed until the food has been digested.
- "Sleeping immediately after eating is harmful. One should try not to sleep for three hours after eating."
- "Three things preserve good health: proper nutrition to replenish the substances eliminated from the body; cleansing of wastes from the body; and the prevention of exhaustion, which leads to weakness and premature aging. By fulfilling the first two, the third will be easily achieved."
- "Elimination should be regular and easy. Constipation contributes to illness."
- "Ideal exercise is that in which the physical workout lifts the spirits. Good spirits are healing to the body – many people have been cured of physical illness through joy."

This next quote sounds comical, but really makes sense:

- "If people would treat themselves as well as they do their animals, they would be spared much illness. No one feeds an animal without first calculating how much food it needs."

I ask you, don't these ideas sound familiar? Haven't we read about them in our current health journals? Let's remember that our body is a gift and the way to best maintain it hasn't changed very much. We know the answers. We know the path to get there. Now we just have to listen!

Brazil's great Amazonian rainforest is tailor-made for eco-tourism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

MANAUS, Brazil — By any measure, the Amazon basin, an unimaginably vast rainforest crisscrossed by rivers and streams and speckled with lakes, is an astonishing eco-system.

Containing one-tenth of the world's plant and animal species, one-third of its remaining forests and one-fifth of its fresh water and oxygen, Amazonia is a naturalist's dream, as well as a precious resource.

Consisting of seven million square kilometres, a region almost as large as Australia and comprising 36 per cent of Brazil's land area, Amazonia has only recently been discovered by nature lovers as an ideal eco-tourism destination.

An aboriginal boy in a village on the banks of the Rio Negro.

Before then, Amazonia – made up of six states ranging from Amazonas in the south to Roraima in the north – was not on the map.

Brazil did not really market the region. Facilities were quite primitive. Travellers were afraid of contracting tropical diseases and were intimidated by Brazil's high-crime rate.

But the picture has since changed significantly.

The Brazilian government has belatedly discovered that tourism pays huge dividends and jungle lodges have sprung up to service visitors' needs. Police have cracked down on criminals who targeted tourists. And a regimen of vaccinations can prevent tourists from contracting yellow fever and malaria.

Manaus, the biggest city in Amazonia, is the gateway to the selva, the jungle and its intricate web of wetlands and highlands. Here you can arrange a stay at a jungle lodge or a canoe trip even deeper into the tangled interior.

Judging by the advice of guides who are probably better acquainted with the rainforest than anyone else, the best time to explore Amazonas – the biggest state in Amazonia and the locale of choice for most tourists – is in the late spring and early summer, when the rainy season has subsided.

In May and June, when water levels peak and are about 13 metres higher than in September or October, you can see far more because canoes can penetrate the remotest crannies of the rainforest.

Since the jungle is all but impenetrable and sometimes waterlogged, a canoe enables you to negotiate the fabled igarapes, the narrow, vine-choked channels that cut deep into the forest and gives you the feeling you have left civilization behind.

Of course, you may opt for a jungle walk, and while it is intensely interesting and should be tried, it pales somewhat in comparison to a remote igarape.

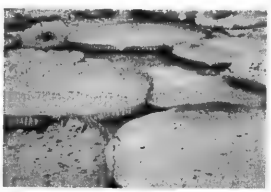
The igarapes are reached via the Amazon River and its 1,100 tributaries, from the Rio Negro and the Rio Branco to the Rio Japuru and the Rio Uburu.

Fed by torrential downpours and the snowmelt of the rugged Andes mountains, these rivers are amazingly wide in places and can accommodate ocean-going vessels. They offer 80,000 kilometres of navigable waterways and drain not only Brazil but all neighbouring countries.

The primary colours of the rainforest are green for the jungle, blue for the sky and most of its rivers, black for the Rio Negro and muddy yellow for the Amazon River, which begins as a gurgling trickle in the hills of Peru.

Amazonia, without a doubt, contains the greatest diversity of life forms on the planet.

It is home to some 300 mammals, notably the elusive jaguar and the reclusive spider monkey. The animals of the Amazon generally avoid contact with humans, invariably emerging at night after the heat of the day has relented. They attack human intruders only when ravenous or cornered.



Queen Victoria water lilies [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

The insects are intriguing, running the gamut from the carnivorous black ant that feeds on rodents to the hairy tarantula spider that is as big as a land crab.

From the remarkably coloured boa constrictor to the poisonous bushmaster, the snakes are awesome in their variety. Unless you deliberately search their lairs, or accidentally brush one off a branch, you will not usually encounter snakes in their habitat.

The 2,000 birds of Amazonia range from the beautifully plumaged macaw to the noisy parrot. The leaf-encrusted floor of the forest is thick with 60,000 plants, ferns and flowers of various hues and sizes. Tropical fruits such as the tapereba and the graviola yield delicious, though somewhat watery, juices.

One of the most memorable sights in the rainforest is the giant Queen Victoria water lily, which blooms in May. Shaped like a humongous pizza, with sharp thorns on its underside, this is a water lily to behold and admire.

There are 2,500 species of trees in the jungle, including 800 varieties of palms, and some of the old-growth hardwoods tower majestically over the canopy.

Incredibly enough, the resins of a panoply of trees can be used for medicinal purposes and in the manufacture of aromatic perfumes. The wood of other hardwoods can be shaped into fine furniture.

Although thousands of kilometres of rainforest already have been cut down, the jungle remains virtually intact and untouched, according to satellite images. Its rivers, streams and creeks teem with 2,000 species of fish, two-thirds of which are edible, and caiman, a relative of the alligator. The most dangerous fish are the red-bellied piranha and the candiru. At the scent of blood, the piranha can devour the flesh of a person or an animal in a few frenzied minutes. Picking up the smell of urine, the pint-sized candiru brutally burrows into the orifices of men and women alike.

The waterfalls around the town of Presidente Figueiredo, a sleepy burg 107 kilometres north of Manaus, are simply spectacular. Approached by elevated walkways piercing the dense foliage, the waterfalls are not particularly high, but they most certainly deserve a lengthy stopover. And the shallow pools around them are perfect for sunbathing.

The workers who hacked through impenetrable underbrush to build the two-lane road to Presidente Figueiredo were initally attacked by indigenous peoples resentful of the encroachments on their land. But nowadays, tourists may visit many of their villages and watch them perform tribal dances and rituals.

Travellers, however, are not permitted to contact the Stone Age Yanomami tribe without a government permit.

If you go: Sunie Stockler of Stockler Expeditions in Plantation, Fla., arranged my trip. She specializes in Brazil. You can reach her at 954-472-7163 or stocklers@usa.net. Varig Airlines has regularly scheduled flights to Brazil from New York City and Miami. In Manaus, you can check into the luxurious five-star Tropical Hotel or Mango House, a motel-like complex set on leafy grounds. Both are reasonably close to the centre of the city.

'First Lady of Boxing' inspires Hollywood movie

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

The "First Lady of Boxing" is often asked what a nice Jewish girl like her is doing in a sport like that. Well, with her top-notch management skills and her ability to negotiate a deal, Jackie Kallen always felt she was living a dream.

As the manager of four world championship fighters, all of whom wore the Star of David on their trunks even though none of them was Jewish, Kallen succeeded in a world she once described as a "bastion of masculinity and chauvinism, full of scotch, cigars, tough guys and tough talk."

Her career inspired the movie Against the Ropes starring Meg Ryan, which opened in theatres recently. It is not a documentary of her life, but Kallen, who had a small part in the film, says it "perfectly captures the spirit of the story."

She'll complete a tell-all autobiography after her 18-city promotional tour wraps up. Kallen is already the author of Hit Me With Your Best Shot and has two TV shows in the works.

Born Jackie Kaplan in 1946 into a suburban middle-class Detroit home, she truly arrived on the boxing scene in 1991 when she managed her first champion. Her managerial debut actually came three years earlier with the arrival of heavyweight Bobby Hitz.

"I had been telling everyone that I was going to have a champion and people kind of snickered," she recalls. "When I did take [James Toney] off the street and turn him into a champion, they really looked at me a little bit differently."

A two-time nominee for Manager of the Year, former commissioner of the International Female Boxers Association and member of the Michigan Jewish Sports Hall of Fame, Kallen says her proudest moment in boxing came on May 10, 1991, the night Toney won the middleweight championship.

"There's really nothing that could compare, especially because we fought the guy in his hometown and were 20-to-1 underdogs," she says. "That was probably the most exciting night of my life in boxing. It has not been equalled since."

Kallen married at 20 and had two sons before getting a job as a rock and roll journalist for a Detroit-area newspaper. She would become a TV personality before venturing into sportswriting.

A 1977 interview with Thomas "Hit Man" Hearns was her introduction to the fight game and she spent the next decade working as his publicist and personal assistant.

She learned during that time and in her first few years as a manager that each boxer is unique and requires a different approach.

"It's tough to know what makes each person tick," she says. "Each fighter has a different personality, different things motivate them. You've got to find all the right buttons to push in each individual fighter."

Kallen uses some of those techniques as a keynote motivational speaker these days, talking about overcoming discrimination and a life-threatening illness.

Jackie Kallen, in a movie inspired by her life.

Over the past few years, Kallen has endured the break-up of her 30-year marriage, was threatened with death by Toney and underwent two lumpectomies. After losing both parents, she moved to Los Angeles in 1997 for a fresh start, but while exercising in a gym, she dropped a barbell that shattered half her face.

The relationship with Toney has healed and Kallen is in better health now despite having had a heart attack last year.

She manages only one fighter at present, a promising 19-year-old junior middleweight named Muhammad Ali Diab. There are just too many other things going on in her life at present, she says.

"I would be doing them a disservice. I don't have as much time to devote to going to the gym to work with these kids.

"If I find a fighter who I thought was championship-material, I would make time."

But she says charity work is in her heart and "what she really loves the most" is working with homeless and abused women in the Los Angeles area.

Today she's feeling great. She takes lots of medications, and they're working well. Kallen now tries not to get stressed too easily because "nothing is worth having another heart attack over."

Plans in gear for 2005 Maccabiah Games

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — No sooner does one Maccabiah Games end than planning for the next one begins.

In July 2005, the 17th edition of the "Jewish Olympics" will be held in Israel, and Maccabi Canada is looking for coaches, assistant coaches, medical teams, chaperones, and other support staff to get the show on the road.

"Don't forget, we have to have most of the athletes for the team sports picked by the end of 2004," said Leon Elfassy, a member of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee (NAC).

Once the coaches are selected – hopefully by next month – regional and national trials will follow in a range of sports to produce the team of Canadian Jews – juniors, adults, and "Masters" – who will make up a contingent of more than 400 people.

Elfassy spoke about one month after returning from the 10th edition of the Pan-American Maccabi Games, which began in Santiago, Chile, on Dec. 25 and ran through the new year.

Canada sent a delegation of about 80 people (and 50 supporters) – including Maccabi Canada president Lawrence Hart and NAC chair Allen Gerskup – that returned with a respectable number of medals.

But Elfassy was most excited about the hospitality of the host community and the success the games had in instilling a sense of what the Maccabi movement is all about: Jewish identity and brotherhood.

"The important thing is that people were motivated to stay involved," he said.

Elfassy acknowledged that the last Maccabiah in 2001 was a shadow of its usual self, as the the fear of terrorism scared many people away.

Divisions erupted within the Maccabi movement over whether to go ahead with the games or cancel them. The divisions also existed within Maccabi Canada, which sent a pared-down team of 170 athletes (instead of 400).

Maccabi Canada is also trying to regroup after the the recent death of vice-president Bernie Offstein of Toronto, and it's trying to get its fundraising efforts in gear.

Toronto hosted a hugely successful fundraiser last fall that honoured Maccabi Canada vice-president Robert Lantos. In Quebec, the organization also held a successful tennis fundraiser last November.

Elfassy said confidence is high as the next Maccabiah approaches. The number of athletes will be back to normal and Canada is looking to build on its medal legacy.

"We really plan to send our biggest and best team to Israel," he said.

Elfassy hopes Canada can send an outdoor soccer team and said there will be a new impetus to take more athletes in the "youth" and "junior" categories (meaning born between 1987 and 1990).

There will also be the Master's Maccabiah for athletes aged 35 and up and sports for the physically challenged.

Anyone interested in becoming a coach can call Elfassy, at 514-737-6727, ext. 21, or Harry Hus, at 514-489-7767. In Toronto, call 416-398-0515.

Those interested in becoming involved at any level should visit the Maccabi Canada website at www.maccabicanada.com.

My father and his son

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

In the past, I've written about the gift my sisters and I were born into, having parents who were committed to the welfare and growth of the Jewish people and the world.

My father, Phyvle Rosensweig (may he rest in peace), and my mother, Gitel (may she live to be 120), deeply cared about the frailties of humankind and the awesome divinity of our every breath. Their legacy as a care-giving team beats like a drum within the souls of the thousands of Jews and non-Jews they touched.

However, as so often occurs within men whose spirit embraces the entire planet, my father was not quite as natural at directing his powerful energies my way. He was so "public" it was difficult for him to be "private." Our relationship, in fact, was predicated on his disappointment in what I was not, and my disappointment in his inability to champion my spirit.

As our relationship deteriorated, I began to dislike myself and became depressed. My father's feelings were similar and made worse by the fact he was a Jewish leader, counselling others on healthy parental relationships. This must have been very difficult for him.

My father died in 1989. The barbed wire of pain that we constructed between us had become so jagged that his physical passing was easier for me than the death of our relationship prior to his demise. The emotional and mental burden of our strained father-son relationship played a major role in the development of my panic and anxiety attacks. I am however, thank God, healthier and stronger every day.

I write this article fully aware of the fundamental tenet within Judaism to "honour thy father," regardless of whether he is dead or alive. This is not a diatribe by an angry and bitter middle-aged son against the man who fathered and raised him. Quite the contrary. I sincerely hope that living, breathing fathers and sons who may be suffering as we did might learn and grow by reading about our experiences.

Learn how to express your love for one another. Do so because a mutual embrace and a positive word of recognition can make a difference between a healthy adulthood or one fraught with years of despair and self-doubt. Celebrate each other's personality, quirkiness and foibles, whether they are what you had hoped for or otherwise.

Figure it out, no matter what it takes. My father and I lacked the tools to explore and find a safe place to celebrate each other's character and our unique familial bond. Instead, we suffered quietly, knowing that the other was in deep pain yet never acting on the underlying awareness that he was my only father and I was his only son – and the love between us was very real.

By the time my dad died, we had become virtual strangers. Damn. Why didn't we have the time or the wherewithal to discover the things that could have made our lives better?

Work your relationship with reckless abandon. Find a brilliant parent and make them your mentor. Join a support group. Find yourself a life coach. Don't allow your son to suffer quietly and think that his "flawed" personality is responsible for the pain between you.

When you are old enough, flip it around. Give your father a break from his guilt and sadness, possibly stemming from his belief that he could have done better, that he should have broken the chain of bitterness that existed between him and his father.

Love your son like the biblical character Avraham loved Yitzchak. Trust your father like Yitzchak loved Avraham. Sacrifice for one another. The father-son relationship is inherently complex. Yet when it shines, nothing can dull it. And the reality is, it is easier to hug a father and express sheer joy in this unique relationship while he is still alive.

Avrum Rosensweig can be reached via e-mail at mail@veahavta.org.

Chocolate Truffle Cookies for Purim

4 oz. sq. unsweetened chocolate
2 cups (12 oz.) semisweet chocolate chips
1/3 cup butter
1 cup sugar
3 eggs
1 1/2 tsp. vanilla
1/2 cup flour
2 tblsp. cocoa
1/4 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
confectioners' sugar

Melt unsweetened chocolate, 1 cup of the chocolate chips and butter; cool 10 mins. Beat sugar and eggs for 2 mins. in a bowl. Beat in vanilla and chocolate mixture. Combine flour, cocoa, baking powder and salt; beat into chocolate mixture. Stir in remaining chocolate chips. Cover and chill for at least 3 hrs. Remove about 1 cup of dough. With lightly floured hands, roll into 1-inch balls. Place on ungreased baking sheets. Bake at 350°F 10-12 min. or until lightly puffed and set. Cool in pan 3-4 min. before removing to a wire rack to cool completely. Repeat with remaining dough. Dust with confectioners' sugar. Yield: about 4 dozen.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My father has been fighting cancer for the last year. We are down to his last few weeks or days and he is now in palliative care.

I am the eldest daughter in a family of three children. My mother is not handling this very well and leans on me a lot. My two brothers come to visit, but never stay for more than 15 minutes. I stay with mom as much as I can, as she needs me now more than my own family.

Mom has asked me to give my father's eulogy. I freaked when she originally asked, since it is really the last thing I want to do. However, now that I have had a bit of time to let the idea sink in, I realize that maybe instead of letting a stranger do it, I should, for mom's sake and the rest of the family. I'm just not sure I can get through this. Shouldn't this be my time to grieve too… in my way?

My Right to Grieve

Dear My Right to Grieve,

It's obvious you put the needs of others before your own. Helping your mom get through this with the comfort and support of her daughter and contemplating giving your dad's eulogy even though you don't want to speak volumes about the kind of person you are.

You absolutely do have the right to grieve in your way. Everyone has that right. However, let me point out a couple of things about the eulogy.

The word eulogy comes from the Greek eulogia, meaning praise or blessing.

Besides fulfilling your mother's wishes, this eulogy can serve a number of important functions. It gives you a reason to go back and relive some of the very special memories you and your dad shared. Those memories can transport you to those special times in your life. Once you begin writing, you may find the process healing. You can also think of it as the final gift you will be able to give your dad.

Your eulogy will be the most memorable part of the ceremony. It will give people the chance to know your dad as you did. Think this through carefully… there won't be a second chance.

Nechama Jacobs, Grade 5

The larger lessons

Editorial

When we teach our children, sometimes it is the adults who absorb the larger lessons. Young Nechama Jacobs colourfully reminds us that it is once again the time of year when we join with our children to hop onto the Purim Express, even if the state of the world abates in our hearts the sense of "gladness and joy" we were intended to feel.

And lest we yield to our worries about the state of the world, Ezra Karakowsky's wry clown stands resolutely in our path pointing to the feast and celebration that are our commands for the holiday.

Given the events of the last two weeks, it is, therefore, a double children's directive that urges us to catch the feeling that pervades the Purim Express this year.

Two Sundays ago, a suicide bomber climbed aboard a Jerusalem city bus and killed eight Israelis, two of them high school students.

The same day, the government of Iran confirmed it had purchased nuclear equipment from rogue international salesmen. No one doubts the components were applied to Iran's efforts to build and/or acquire nuclear weaponry.

The next day, at The Hague, Israel was vilified on the streets outside the International Court of Justice as an "apartheid state," and in the courtroom itself as responsible for "far more bloody terror [than suicide bombings] since its [Israel's] founding." On trial by the august panel of 15 judges, amid the kangaroo and carnival tableau, was, essentially, Israel's right to defend itself.

Apparently, the International Red Cross was more outraged by Israel's security fence than it has been by any event, incident, violence or other hostility that it has witnessed across the troubled years of its centuries-old history. Thus, Red Cross leaders in Geneva felt it necessary to depart from the agency's longstanding, near-hallowed tradition of strict neutrality in international conflicts and condemn the fence as an affront to humanity.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Anti-Semitic Graffiti

VANCOUVER — Anti-Semitic graffiti was found last month for the second time since December in Steveston, part of the Vancouver suburb Richmond. Swastikas and the words "Cremate Jews," as well as the word "Diaspora" and an expletive, were scrawled in felt pen on nautical hardware on the Steveston wharf, the Western Jewish Bulletin reported. In December at Steveston Secondary School, swastikas and comments such as "Jews are gay" and "Burn in the oven Jews" were drawn in felt pen over Christmas and Chanukah decorations on school windows.

Vets to be Honoured

CALGARY — An expansion of the Museum of the Regiments, the second largest armed forces museum in Canada (after Ottawa's Canadian War Museum), will name a new art gallery after the Jewish War Veterans of Canada (JWVC) as part of a $15 million expansion. Half of the new gallery, to be housed in space freed up by the renovation, will feature art on rotating loan from the Canadian War Museum's13,000-piece Beaverbrook War Art Collection. The gallery will also house temporary collections, starting with one on the JWVC, as well as a small permanent Jewish veterans exhibit. Construction is slated to end in 2005.

WORLD

Hezbollah Ban Sought

LONDON — The umbrella group for British Jews has urged the government to block reception of Hezbollah's satellite TV station. British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw told the director-general of the Board of Deputies, Neville Nagler, that he "shares your disgust" at the anti-Semitism expressed in the Al-Manar series The Diaspora, a board statement said.

Nazi-looted Art Case

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A case involving Nazi-looted art reached the U.S. Supreme Court last week. Judges were to hear arguments in the case of Maria Altmann, who is seeking to recover six paintings, valued at $110 million (US), seized from her family by the Nazis. Austria's National Gallery says it acquired them in 1948 in a gift from Altmann's brother and argues that U.S. law doesn't allow lawsuits against sovereign nations for historic deeds.

Shoah Plaque Destroyed

PARIS — A plaque on a Paris school honouring the memory of Jews deported to Auschwitz has been destroyed. Former members of the French Resistance arriving for a ceremony at the Japy Gymnasium last week discovered the plaque broken on the ground outside the building. The plaque marked the deportation of the district's Jews to Auschwitz in 1941 and 1942. Paris Mayor Bertrand Delanoe called the desecration "disgusting" and said a new plaque would be put up as soon as possible. The city has filed a police complaint.

50 Years of Dissent

NEW YORK — A magazine launched by left-wing intellectuals, including Irving Howe, is celebrating its 50th birthday this week. "If you want to know why Dissent is 'left-wing,' look at what the most right-wing administration has called 'compassionate conservatism,'" co-editor Mitchell Cohen wrote in the 50th-anniversary issue. Dissent has a circulation of between 8,000 and 10,000.

Jews Not Blamed

NEW YORK — Sixty-two per cent of Americans believe Jews were not responsible for Jesus' death, a new poll says. The Anti-Defamation League released the survey last week on the eve of the opening of Mel Gibson's controversial new movie, The Passion of the Christ. But in the poll of 1,200 Americans conducted in December, 25 per cent said the statement "Do you think that Jews were responsible for the death of Christ?" was probably true. A similar poll by ABCNews.com found 80 per cent of Americans don't blame Jews for Jesus' crucifixion.

Rabbis Arrested

NEW YORK — Rabbi Shmuel Herzfeld of Amcha-The Coalition for Jewish Concerns and Rabbi Eliot Pearlson of Miami Beach were arrested after blocking the street in front of the United Nations with a coffin to protest the International Court of Justice's hearing on Israel's security barrier. "The coffin symbolizes the many hundreds of people who have been killed by this terrorism that has affected the world like a plague," Rabbi Herzfeld said. More than 600 people protested the hearing at another nearby Amcha rally.

Rights Commission to Probe Websites

LONDON, Ont. — The Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) will hold hearings on two now-defunct websites that a complainant alleges promoted hatred against people who are not Christian or Caucasian.

No date has been set for the hearing involving James Scott Richardson of London and Alex Kulbashian of Toronto, who are alleged to have operated the websites of the Tri-city Skins and the Canadian Ethnic Cleansing Team.

Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman, who works for the CHRC, is seeking $80,000 in fines and damages against the two alleged white supremacists. Warman, who earlier filed a human rights complaint against Bell Canada for a website it provided London resident Tom Winnicki, said "the kind of material they were putting out was viciously bigoted."

The London Free Press quoted Kulbashian as saying Warman has a conflict of interest in bringing the case.

The Canadian Ethnic Cleansing Team allegedly compared immigrants to rats and advocated first cutting off the supply and killing off the remainder. Warman also alleges the group posted a message that made fun of the Holocaust. He is seeking damages because of personal remarks about him on the sites.

Mohammad terror case nearing an end?

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Appeal of removal order dismissed, clearing way for deportation

At 16 years and counting, the immigration case of Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad may finally be coming to an end.

Recent legal developments, in theory at least, could mean the convicted Palestinian terrorist is closer to being thrown out of Canada.

In late January, the Federal Court of Appeal dismissed Mohammad's appeal of a removal order, leaving it in effect and removing another barrier to his deportation. Already in place was a 2003 pre-removal risk assessment (PRRA) that concluded Mohammad could be safely deported to Lebanon.

Mohammad, a former member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), faced imminent deportation. However, his lawyer quickly challenged the PRRA, filing a leave application with the Federal Court trial division in a bid to challenge its findings. A date for that hearing has not yet been set.

Huguette Shouldice, a spokesperson for the Canadian Border Services Agency, said if the court declines to grant Mohammad an appeal, he will be removed from Canada.

"We continue all the time to move towards his removal," she said.

In Mohammad's case, "all the time" refers to the period beginning shortly after his arrival in Canada in 1987.

Federal authorities have been trying to deport the now 60-year-old terrorist, but he has managed to string out the case through a seemingly interminable series of legal challenges.

In December 1968, Mohammad was a member of the PFLP when he and a PFLP comrade hijacked an El Al flight about to take off in Athens. During the course of the terrorist incident, they sprayed the aircraft with gunfire and lobbed grenades. An Israeli man was killed in the attack.

Mohammad was arrested, convicted of negligent manslaughter and sentenced to 17 years in jail, but about one year later another group of Palestinian terrorists hijacked a plane, threatened to blow it up and demanded the release of seven terrorists, including Mohammad.

The Greek government complied, setting free and pardoning Mohammad. He subsequently immigrated to Canada, where he gained permanent residency status. Immigration officials attempted to remove him almost immediately, arguing he entered the country fraudulently by not revealing his terrorist past. After losing that part of the case, Mohammad filed a claim for refugee status, but that claim was rejected in 1995.

Shouldice said she believes Mohammad is now having his last kick at the can. Despite his many legal challenges, "what I can tell you is that we don't give up. In the end, we will remove that person."

In Mohammad's bid to overturn the PRRA finding, his lawyer, Barbara Jackman, argued Mohammad "represents no threat to anyone or any country."

Court documents filed by Jackman state that Mohammad suffers from a heart disease and diabetes, is unemployed, has close family ties to Canada and that his wife is suffering from cancer. The terrorist incident happened long ago and at any rate, she contends, Mohammad and his PFLP partner never intended to kill anyone.

Referring to the risk he might face in Lebanon, she argues the country is inhospitable to Palestinians, limits their rights and their access to medical care. Removal to Lebanon would be cruel and unusual punishment under the circumstances, she states.

'Upon your walls, O Jerusalem'

From the editor's desk

A week ago Sunday, on Feb. 22, the Third Prime Minister's Conference for Tourism to Israel convened in Jerusalem. More than 600 guests from around the world attended the innovative three-day gathering. Among them were the ministers of tourism from Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Portugal, Turkey and the Ukraine.

Israel does not rely on the people of these seven countries to sustain its tourism industry. Much like the Jewish state, these countries have relatively small populations. Large streams of Azerbaijani or Bulgarian or Czech tourists simply do not pour into Israel on a regular basis.

Yet the participation of these governments in the conference was very important to Israel for a number of reasons, not the least of which was to manifest their friendship and solidarity with the embattled Jewish state.

The CJN was there too. Over the next few weeks, I will use this space to convey what I considered to be some of the event's highlights.

The proceedings officially opened Sunday night at Binyanei Ha'uma, Jerusalem's International Convention Centre, with a reception, a long list of speakers, dinner and entertainment.

But the introductory remarks, as it were, came much earlier in the day as children were going to school and their parents were struggling to get to work in rush-hour traffic.

A terrorist on Bus. 14, in south-central Jerusalem, ignited the suicide belt he was wearing, killing eight people – two of them youngsters on their way to school – and injuring more than 50 others.

It was thus a combination of anger, melancholy, defiance and emotional weariness that infused the mood of the large assembly in the conference centre Sunday night.

Tourism Minister Binyamin Elon sensed that mood and articulated the question most people would not publicly express.

"How can we continue [with the conference] after so devastating an event?" he asked quite openly.

Then, immediately, he asked, "But how can we not continue?

"If we were to cancel the plans, if we were to stop our lives, it would give them a victory."

Elon stated explicitly what Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had implied moments before when he greeted the delegates to Jerusalem.

"The gates of Jerusalem and the gates of Israel will always remain open to visitors from around the world, without differentiation between peoples, races and creeds," Sharon declared.

Quoting the Bible, the prime minister made plain for all in the audience the connection between modern Israel's steel-hard resolve and ancient Israel's eternal obligation regarding its capital: "Upon your walls, O Jerusalem have I posted guardians."

No one doubted these words meant a great deal to him.

Sharon did not remain in the hall after he delivered his greetings. He could not. Everyone understood. Israeli life would not be stopped. And the tour operators and organizers who comprised the majority of the 600 guests from overseas were convening to determine what role they could play to ensure the fact.

With the holiday of Purim merely hours away, I wish to draw readers' attention to two recently published books about Queen Esther. One imagines her life, while the other interprets and applies its lessons for the modern businesswoman.

The Gilded Chamber by Rebecca Kohn (Rugged Land Books), is an imaginative, thoughtful work. Using a first-person voice for Esther, Kohn narrates the life story of the young orphan who became a Persian queen. She fleshes out the bare-bones story we read in the Megillah.

Kohn's imagining of life in the tyrant's harem is compelling. It is no Arabian Nights romantic fantasy. It is, rather, a stirring depiction of the degradation, humiliation and abuse of life as a mere sexual vessel of a tyrant king.

The author skillfully, seamlessly weaves the dialogue of the Megillah into the fabric of her fictional account. We confront the key characters of the Purim story, who Kohn has expanded maturely and plausibly, suggesting to us who they might have actually been, and why events unfolded as they did. The Gilded Chamber is a fascinating read.

In What Queen Esther Knew by Connie Glaser and Barbara Smalley (Rodale Publishing), the authors identify Esther as a model of leadership. They argue that her unique character traits can serve as a guiding template for women seeking to establish themselves in a harsh, competitive, sometimes unfriendly business world.

"The story of Esther is not only about miracles, but also about intellectual and spiritual resources," Glaser says. Esther is the paradigm in whom those intellectual and spiritual resources shine clearly for all women to see, understand and apply to their own lives – with the authors' help, of course.

MAKUYA MARCH: Members of the Makuya Japanese Zionist movement marched through Jerusalem on their annual visit to Israel last week. Despite travel advisories by the Japanese government, a Makuya delegation arrived for their annual pilgrimage. Members of the Christian group began coming to Israel in 1955. Waving Japanese and Israeli flags, the men, dressed in blue jackets with menorah and Star of David prints over their suits, and the women, wearing traditional kimonos, sang and danced their way through the capital.

ON THE SLOPES: The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation's 7th annual Ski Day took place recently at Alpine Ski Club. Sponsored by Bank of Montreal and Fabricland, 120 participants took the day off work to support the Shaare Zedek Medical Centre. Included in the festivities of the day were ski lessons and races, a raffle, and a live and silent auction. The ski day raised $40,000, an increase from last year's event. Throughout the day there were reminders of why funds were being raised. Two days before the event, the Shaare Zedek emergency room was once again filled with 21 victims who were seriously injured by a suicide bomber. All fundraising events benefit Shaare Zedek Medical Centre's new emergency department in Jerusalem, due to open in August 2004. It will be the largest and most technologically advanced emergency department in Israel. Seen here, from left, skiers Marla Sone, Michele Glucksman, Shaindy Fischer, Evan Sone.

UJA campaign winds up at a projected $60M

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Campaign 2004 has already raised $54 million and is expected to reach at least $60 million in donations, campaign co-chair Richard Venn announced last week.

Venn, who co-chaired the 2004 campaign with Allan Silber, told the annual campaign closing event, held at the York Event Theatre, that funds raised help young Israelis who have lost a parent or parents to terror, and they also provide medical equipment for hospitals and trauma centres, extended day-care programs and security for Israeli children, financial backing for the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), and advocacy training for thousands of young Jewish students on campus.

The campaign helps Jews in Toronto and all over the world, noted Barbara Bregman, outgoing chair of Women's Campaign and Advocacy, which raised about $7 million of the total.

Silber credited more than 1,000 volunteers and almost 23,000 donors for the campaign's success.

Robert Harlang and Chuck Winograd will chair Campaign 2005, and Fran Sonshine is the new Women's Campaign and Advocacy chair. Federation staffer Lisa Morrison, former campaign director, has been appointed vice-president of UJA Federation. Jeff Springer will take over in her previous position, Silber announced.

MP Caplan says she won't run in next election

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Asked what she's looking forward to most following her retirement from 26 years in the political arena, Elinor Caplan chuckles. "I'm ready to stop commuting to Ottawa," she says.

Caplan, the Liberal MP for Thornhill, Canada's most Jewish riding, announced last week she will not run in the next federal election, widely expected to take place this spring.

She's "ready to seek new challenges. I just felt it was time to move on and try other opportunities."

The 59-year-old MP, the first Jewish woman to serve in the federal cabinet, was dropped from Prime Minister Paul Martin's cabinet. Under former prime minister Jean Chrétien, she served in two cabinet posts, first as minister of citizenship and immigration and then as minister of national revenue.

She will represent Thornhill until a possible May election. After that, "I'll do what I want, as opposed to doing what others want."

Caplan told The CJN she didn't expect to be named to Martin's cabinet.

"He appointed three Jewish members to cabinet [Irwin Cotler, Jacques Saada and Jack Austin] and I thought that was fabulous."

Caplan won the riding of Thornhill in 1997 with a plurality of about 60 per cent. "I was profoundly grateful and honoured," she recalled. Being named two years later to the immigration post was a special honour.

"My grandmother, who immigrated to Canada from Poland at age five, and who couldn't even vote, would not have imagined that one day a Jewish woman would become immigration minister," Caplan said.

Under her tenure, Ottawa passed a new Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, which overhauled and streamlined the system by which newcomers and refugee claimants are processed.

Caplan was re-elected in 2000 with an even greater plurality, but only after some heated name-calling in which she referred to supporters of the Canadian Alliance as "Holocaust deniers, prominent bigots and racists."

That was in the wake of the Liberal government's support of a United Nations resolution that condemned Israel for excessive force in putting down the Palestinian intifadah.

The Alliance seized on Canada's support for the resolution as an election issue, and it galvanized the Jewish community, but not enough to unseat the Liberals.

In Thornhill riding especially, Caplan was often a lightning rod for the Jewish community's anger at the Liberals' record on Israel. Many voters felt she did not adequately represent Israel's wishes to her boss, or that Chrétien ignored her.

It's a charge she counters vigorously.

"Jean Chrétien was most under-appreciated by the Jewish community. He was the first prime minister to visit Israel. He went to Auschwitz and spoke out strongly against anti-Semitism. He never said no to Israel, and the community never gave him credit for that."

Elinor Caplan

Caplan said the best gauge is how Israel feels, "not partisan individuals."

"Israel considers Canada to be one of its best friends. And friends sometimes disagree with each other."

Caplan feels the Canadian Alliance "manipulated" the Jewish community in the wake of the 2000 UN vote. "They used the issue to try to convince the community for other reasons," she said, namely to win votes for privatized health care.

Caplan feels she did a good job representing the community's concerns to the government. Besides, "people knew they were not electing a member of the Knesset."

In January, 2002, Caplan was named revenue minister. Around that time, the Canadian wing of Magen David Adom (CMDA) was experiencing tax problems for providing aid beyond Israel's post-1967 territories.

Caplan was taken to task for not being vocal on the issue.

But a deal was soon struck that allowed Magen David Adom to keep its designation as a registered charity.

Caplan is reluctant to explain how that came about, saying only, "My own view is they [CMDA] were not given good advice."

Asked whether she intervened directly on behalf of the group, Caplan said: "I never contacted them directly. My approach was always quiet.

"Let's just say that in this case, it worked."

Prior to entering federal politics, Caplan represented the riding of Oriole in the Ontario legislature from 1985 to 1997. She served as a cabinet minister in the Liberal government of David Peterson, first as chair of management board and later as minister of health, becoming the first Jewish woman to serve in either a provincial or federal cabinet in Canadian history.

Her political career began in the then Toronto suburb of North York in 1978 when she was elected to the North York municipal council.

Gibson's film delivers beating of biblical proportions

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Review

It could have been worse. But it's not good. Not by a long shot.

It will be difficult – impossible for some people – to walk out of Mel Gibson's firestorm of a movie, The Passion of the Christ, even in the real likelihood of leaving before it's over, and not conclude that Jews – the leadership, the rabble, the quasi-leadership, call them what you will – bore some degree of responsibility for the death of Jesus, ranging from a good deal to total.

Not only that, but they regretted it. And continue to.

After attending a screening last week for critics and religious press types, I pause and defer to U.S. Jewish commentator Dennis Prager, who put it best when he said that when viewing The Passion, Jews and Christians will be watching two entirely different films.

"For two hours," Prager observed after a preview, "Christians watch their saviour [being] tortured and killed. For the same two hours, Jews watch Jews arrange the killing and torture of the Christians' saviour."

The message, intended or not, is inescapable, even for those who know that the vast majority of anti-Semitism in Canada and the United States today no longer emanates from Christians and even for those who know that Christians are among Jews' best friends and most ardent Zionists: The Jews (the Pharisees, their minions and the great unwashed) want Gibson's Jesus dead, and they don't stop wheedling, pressing, insisting and bullying the thoughtful, decent and reluctant Pontius Pilate until the deed is done.

Even a beating of biblical proportions, which Pilate deems sufficient punishment for the miscreant preacher from Galilee, is not enough for the clamouring Jews. "Crucify him!" they intone – all of them, except, of course, the Jews who follow Jesus. Those Jews are above reproach. Somehow, they even look cleaner.

Those who ponder whether Gibson is anti-Semitic are missing the point, suggests Rabbi Benjamin Blech of Aish HaTorah in the United States. Let's assume Gibson isn't – and it's unlikely that he is, since it's hard to get ahead in Hollywood if you hate Jews (though Gibson had to have been raised in an anti-Semitic environment given that his father Hutton is a Holocaust-denying loon). What matters is what the film will accomplish. In this case, in true Hollywood style, it has crafted a villain.

And that villain is the Jews, at least in the film's first half. In the second, it's the sadistic Romans – but they only torture Jesus at the Jews' insistence.

By now, there should be little debate that all the Gospels of the New Testament, to a greater or lesser extent, apportion moral responsibility for Jesus' death to Jews. Gibson the filmmaker, the artist, has every right to make any movie he wants. Besides, this one's $25-million (US) budget came out of his own pocket.

But The Passion is not based on any one or all the Gospels, none of which even agree with any other. This is the Gospel According to Mel, and the liberties he takes are many and inexplicably occult-ish.

For one, he crafts a scene from whole cloth in which kippah-clad Jewish children who mock the betrayer Judas morph into monsters and demons. It doesn't seem to matter that this takes place only through the eyes of Judas, who is consumed by guilt and a touch of madness. The message is received.

And what to make of a Golem-like satanic figure that slithers in and out of scenes? In one of them, the black-robed androgynous representation of evil walks among the Jews, even holding in its arms the spawn of the Devil. Pure overblown Hollywood.

The four Gospel accounts do not agree on the identity of the figure at the Crucifixion who dares Jesus to use his divine powers to come down from the cross. In Gibson's account, the figure is the Jewish high priest Caiaphas himself, in his black-and-gold finery, who throws down the gauntlet before Jesus. Of course, Jesus does come down from the cross, after a fashion, alive and well. That'll show the Jews.

And then there's the infamous blood curse, uttered in the Book of Matthew by the high priest. "His blood be upon us and on our children," he intones at the moment of Jesus' death. In the annals of violent Christian anti-Semitism, these are the words, the ones used to justify two millennia of slandering Jews forever as "Christ-killers."

The line's provenance is as follows: It was in the rough cut Gibson presented to evangelical pastors in pre-screenings last month. Then, it was announced, possibly as a last-minute sop to Jewish pressure, that it would be cut. How did Gibson finally handle it? In true weaselly fashion: It's in the film, but spoken only in Aramaic and not subtitled in English. It's there, but it isn't.

But the greatest example of Jewish regret for what they caused, to me anyway, takes place in about five fleeting seconds of film. Once the execution of Jesus is complete, the skies darken and the earth quakes. So far, so good. But Gibson then chooses to cut to the Temple, which crumbles around Caiaphas' head. Instead of fleeing, the Jewish priest weeps. He knows what he's done, and his remorse only just begins.

It's a dubious claim that Gibson set out to make an anti-Semitic film that clearly blames Jews for Christ's death. The movie is more anti-Jewish Establishment and anti-Sanhedrin (the rabbinic council that finds Jesus guilty of blasphemy and violating Temple law). But the film fails to distinguish between that arguably rogue element and the Jewish masses. Priests and peasants are unnecessarily lumped as one, braying bloodthirsty mass.

The Evangelical Fellowship of Canada warns that twisting the movie's real meaning – that Jesus "willingly died for all of us" – will "lead down a path of ignorantly partaking in a blame-game."

I'm not biting. It is Christians, after all, who have partaken in a blame-game for two millennia. Anyone with preconceived notions about who killed Jesus will only have them reinforced by this film. Only righteous, well-read, open-minded Christians with cast-iron stomachs that can withstand 90 minutes of unimaginable splatter and gore will appreciate Jewish concerns. Pretty small market.

Gibson's defence is well-known: "I'm not singling [Jews] out and saying 'They did it.' We're all culpable. We're all guilty. We all killed Jesus."

Not me. I had nothing to do with Jesus' death. And neither did my immediate forebears. They were too busy being deported, butchered and gassed by Christians for being Jews. The irony is almost too monstrous to discuss.

There's some evidence of nifty cinematography, but ultimately, Gibson has made a loud, over-the-top, melodramatic, Hollywood blockbuster that will, at least according to early and alarmingly bad reviews, bust few blocks.

But if Christians can use it to spread a message of hope, reconciliation, love and renewal, great.

Meantime, this too shall pass.

Purim's larger lessons

Two days later, Mel Gibson's film version of the last 12 hours of the life of Jesus Christ opened in more than 3,000 theatres across North America. Jewish communities worldwide are now holding our collective breath to see what dark emotions and anti-Jewish behaviour the film might rouse.

In his wisdom, Gibson chose to make and release the film at a time when more Jews are being harassed and victimized across Europe than at any time since the end of the World War II.

That same week, an Israeli soldier was attacked and killed at the Erez Junction in Gaza and an Israeli couple was shot and killed in their car by a drive-by shooter in the West Bank.

And that was only one week.

Despite it all, indeed perhaps because of it all, we joyfully get on board the Purim Express, hear the megillah, send mishloach manot, give assistance to the needy and celebrate. That is both our obligation and our delight.

Occasionally overlooked in the drama and positive outcome of the story of Esther is how the Jews were ultimately saved from annihilation.

They were not saved by the king.

He did not revoke the original decree of genocide, promulgated at Haman's request.

Rather, the Jews fought back.

The king authorized the Jews to gather together in self-defence and they did. Together, they defended themselves, their families, their dignity, their way of life.

Indeed, the text uses the word "coming together" in five different but closely located instances, pointing to its importance in the ultimate success of their communal, self-rescue from genocide.

Esther and Mordechai's courage was instrumental in stopping Haman. But it was, finally, the courage of their co-religionists, acting together, that saved the day.

It is this sense of cohesive, communal action that we must find again today in facing the many troublesome issues in the state of the world. And it is this sense of cohesive, communal action that we necessarily try to inculcate into our children when we urge them to drown out the very sound of the name of Haman during the megillah reading.

And what do they learn, starting from a very young age, by that very noisy merriment?

They learn to be involved, as it were, in the unfolding of Jewish destiny; not to be afraid of the villain; and, most important, a sense of confidence in Jewish history that right must always triumph over wrong and justice over evil.

That is why we cheerfully hop on board the Purim Express. For when we see the children in the loud, playful happiness of their Purim pageantry, we remember the story's larger lessons. Chag samayach.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

Schadenfreude is not envy

Bernard Baskin's review of the book Envy ("We need to fight free of envy: author," CJN, Feb. 5) misses an important point.

The rabbis have acknowledged that the yaitzer hara, the evil inclination, is a blessing from God. It was given to us for a purpose. Our challenge is to learn how to do good despite the forces of the evil inclination. Schadenfreude is the opposite of envy. In his book Everyday Ethics, Joshua Halberstam defines envy as being the silent sadness one experiences in witnessing the success of others. Schadenfreude is the joy in witnessing the failure of others.

Whereas envy is an indicator to tell us what we may want in life, Schadenfreude is the perversion of the emotion of joy. Left unchecked, Schadenfreude leads to feelings of joy in actually causing the humiliation and failure of others. That is what the Nazis did to the Jews. It was not envy, but the opposite. Even the 10 Commandments tell us not to covet certain things that may lead to unethical behaviour later on.

Re: Christian Zionists

Regarding the article, "Christian Zionist group planning six Israel missions in 2004" (CJN, Feb. 19), I know many in the Jewish community take great comfort in the support for the Jewish people and Israel they see coming from the Christian Zionist movement. But let's not lose sight of their goals. Christian Zionists believe the modern revival of the State of Israel is a sign that Jesus will return. Their intense love of the Jewish people is only matched by their love and desire to see us embrace Jesus as our messiah.

Pat Robertson, a Christian Zionist and host of the popular TV show The 700 Club, did a news piece about the only survivor of the Jan. 29 bus bombing in Jerusalem. What saved her, according to The 700 Club, was the woman's love and belief in Jesus. One was left with the message that if only the poor Jewish victims had also believed in Jesus, they too would have survived.

The Jewish community should embrace any support we can get in these difficult times, but let's not lose sight of the real motives of many of these groups.

Safed says thank you

We would like to thank Canada's Jewish community for coming to the aid of the people of Safed.

Last fall, I sent a request to Canadians to supply us with food and clothing for many of our families who are hungry and in need of warm winter clothing. The results have been wonderful. People from across Canada have been writing to us and asking how they can help.

As hard times in Israel continue, business have closed, people have been let go from jobs and family subsidies have been cut back. Safed has been particularly hard-hit, as many of our citizens were employed in the tourism industry.

For the past four months, busloads of Canadians have been bringing us warm blankets, coats and sweaters. Anyone who has been to Safed in the winter knows that it is just as cold as in Toronto because our houses are made of cement and stone and have no insulation or central heating. Families put their money into buying food and in many cases cannot afford electricity to heat their homes.

We are especially grateful to those who brought us items directly, as the cost of getting things here from the centre of the country is prohibitive.

Thank you to all of you who have come to our aid. Please come to visit us, or if you know people who are coming, please remind them that we are still looking for food, clothing, eyeglasses and shoes.

Gay marriage erodes Jewish values

Once again, we see the erosion of Jewish tradition and, even worse, a violation of Torah biblical law ("Reform Temple Sinai rabbi to officiate at gay marriages," CJN, Feb. 26).

What amazes me about this kind of decision is that it will further alienate one Jew from another at a time when we mouth platitudes of unity. The foundation of traditional Orthodox Judaism is based on the premise that the Torah is sancrosanct and not subject to the whims of whatever social norms happen to be in vogue. This is how we have survived up until now, and those who cannot see the truth of that approach will ultimately disappear, as did the maskillim (enlightened Jews) of the 19th and 20th centuries.

Shopping all the time

Sociologists and other pundits find great difficulty in pinpointing the differences between Americans and Canadians. Many Canadians will immediately claim that they can easily do so, but in my experience, they end up with a list of American traits that are not Canadian! But negation does not equal description.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Many claim Americans are more aggressive. Does that mean that Canadians are less combative or wimpy? Both claims were made during last year's war on Iraq. Words like daring, belligerent, assertive, courageous and offensive can be used to describe citizens of more than one nation. In the process of distinguishing ourselves from our southern neighbors, we should be careful.

Nonetheless, I have observed some tangible differences. The pace of life in America seems more intense, but perhaps that more accurately describes New York than the entire country. Baseball is more important there than hockey is here, but all sports are of supreme significance in America. The world of entertainment – TV and movies – is excessively influential. Americans cast about for heroes and are not embarrassed by their patriotism. And most tangibly, Americans shop!

And not just in New York. Sawgrass Mall in Florida on any day – even the day after Christmas – is packed with people shopping as if there was no tomorrow. Yes, you will tell me that so is The Bay on Boxing Day. But believe me, there is a difference. American shopping is unlike any shopping you have ever experienced. And Americans do it 24/7.

After living in New York for the past few months, I appreciated that I was able to go out at night after the children were in bed and shop for whatever I needed. Stores and pharmacies are always open. Malls are giant entertainment centres. Weekends are family days at the malls – and they don't open at noon. It is certainly a blessing for working parents. But I began to feel overwhelmed by the ever-present need to shop. I also wondered at what happens in a society that never has a day off. Staff work weekends and holidays.

Canadians shop, but just not all the time. Stores have hours that allow the staff to go home for dinner. That seems like a good thing, though limited hours create a burden for working people, especially working parents.

While both orientations pose certain difficulties, absolute commercialization and constant shopping seems somehow destructive. Hospitals have to stay open. Do stores?

What kind of social foundation is established when family time is shopping time? (Online shopping might seem like a solution, but it removes the social factor from shopping.) Judaism introduced the social and moral necessity of a regular day of rest. It is a gift, I believe, that should not be ignored.

Purim and the Jewish joke

Purim is a time to laugh – at the shpiels we hear when the Megillah is read, at the costumes people wear, at the story of Mordechai and Esther and their dealings with a bumbling king who is so easily beguiled by his evil Grand Vizier.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Purim is a time when all barriers of class and degree are broken down. It is the time for the Lords of Misrule, the tricksters, to come out and show their stuff. Is there some connection between our Jewish comedic sense and the fact that the western world is full of Jewish comedians?

What is so funny about the Jewish people? Think the Marx Brothers, who took their cue from the Jewish kings of vaudeville and burlesque. Think Wayne and Shuster. Think Lenny Bruce, Woody Allen, Adam Sandler (well, he thinks he's funny). Think Ken Finkelman and The Newsroom. Think the two Jerrys, Lewis and Seinfeld. Fanny Brice. Billy Crystal. Mordecai Richler's Jacob Two Two. Jackie Mason (ugh!), George Burns, Danny Kaye. Think Charlie Chaplin and Robin Williams.

Wait a minute, you say, Chaplin wasn't Jewish, and neither is Williams. Of course not, but groups on the lunatic fringe, such as Aryan Nations, decided Chaplin was a Jew and Williams is as well (along with former U.S. president Dwight Eisenhower). Why? Because, well, they're funny. (The same cannot be said for Eisenhower, but that is another story.)

Jews make fun of ourselves. We puncture the pretensions of bloated big shots. We write books (another Jewish trait) about our humour such as William Novak's and Moshe Waldoks's The Big Book of Jewish Humour. We maintain an irreverent view of every authority figure.

It's the pintele yid against the world. It's irony. It's the view of the outsider seeing the foibles of the insiders. Even Freud was going to write a book about Jewish humour, but never got around to it. He should have studied Purim.

A joke: What is the essence of all Jewish holidays? "They tried to kill us, we're still here, let's eat!" So too with Purim.

Two things come together at Purim – laughter and memory. We are told not only to remember Amalek, the ancestor of Haman, but not to forget him. Amalek was – is – no laughing matter. He attacked the weak without cause and became the symbol for all the enemies of the Jews. So too Haman, by stealth and preying on the weak mind of the king, planned his attack on the Jews of Persia.

In Everything Is Illuminated, Jonathan Safran Foer writes: "Jews have six senses: Touch, taste, sight, smell, hearing [and] memory… The Jew is pricked by a pin and remembers other pins." His Woody-Allen-like hero, Safran, explains, "I used to think that humor was the only way to appreciate how wonderful and terrible the world is, to celebrate how big life is… But now I think it's the opposite. Humor is a way of shrinking from that wonderful and terrible world."

Purim and laughter are central to Jewish identity. After all, Purim is the only holiday that will still be celebrated when the Messiah comes. That's a pretty big burden for a story that doesn't even mention God. But it is all illuminated if we consider that Purim brings memory and humour together. We remember because we have to, but we laugh at the experience of remembering. We laugh at those pins that pricked us.

Many people were upset by the Italian comedian Roberto Benigni's Holocaust film Life Is Beautiful. It portrayed a hapless bookseller who is shipped off with his wife and son to a concentration camp, where his comic tricks keep his boy alive. Critics thought Benigni was treating the Holocaust in an undignified way, of making light of its horrors. I completely understand their point of view.

But maybe Benigni was trying to show us the power and healing force of laughter and make-believe. His protagonist demonstrates the ability to experience the worst in life and keep on laughing.

The Talmud even has God laughing. When the rabbis were arguing a point, the text says, Rabbi Eliezer called on Heaven to do miracles for him to prove his argument. His colleagues finally call out to Heaven, "Lo b'shamayim hi" – in other words, God, you gave us the Torah and now it is up to us to interpret it.

God laughs: "My children have defeated me."

To paraphrase the Israeli song, "We'll never stop singing," let's enjoy Purim and say, "We'll never stop laughing."

Chag Purim Samayach.

'Sweeps month' in ancient Persia

Oh, to be a television executive in ancient Persia during Adar, otherwise known as sweeps month…

Host: Last week on The Bachelor, King Achashverosh selected Esther after meeting women from the 127 lands of his empire at his palace. This week, Achashverosh and Esther go on their first date. Let's watch.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

Achashverosh (at the wheel of his SUV, fiddling with the CD player): So, Esther, you into music? Let's see what I've got here… there's KC and the Shushan Band, Frankie Goes to Mesopotamia and The Rolling Stones' new album.

Esther (in the passenger seat): The Stones? They're still recording?

Achashverosh: Yeah, they've been around for ages. Anyway, Esther, babe, so, like, what are your hobbies?

Esther: Oh, I don't know. Honouring my uncle, I guess. Saving my people. You know… stuff. How about you?

Achashverosh: Oh, I'm into lots of things, but I'm not one to babble on. Get it? Ha ha! Babble on! Babylon!! Anyway, short answer, I guess I'd have to say that my favourite hobbies would be getting drunk and beheading disobedient wives… Hey, let's go for sushi!

After The Bachelor, viewers would be treated to an episode of Trading Spaces where Haman goes to his neighbour's house to build a new gallows. Following that would be a series of cooking shows outlining palace feast ideas (oh, what to serve when your entire empire is coming over on short notice), and the viewing day would end with a special episode of the somewhat popular 1990s sitcom Hanging With Mr. Cooper, guest starring Haman's 10 sons.

It's easy to make light of Purim. Tradition begs it. We're encouraged to dress in costumes, drink, feast, give gifts and make noise in shul. We've packaged Purim for kids and loaded it with carnival games and sugar. "Kids, this is a picture of Haman," barks the carnival booth volunteer. "He wanted to kill all the Jews. Let's throw bean bags at him and then have cotton candy."

My own memories of Purim include a "Purim prom" at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in Winnipeg. A week of skits, songs and classroom-decorating culminated in the prom. My memories of the actual dance are pretty sketchy, although I do recall clinging to the wall like Velcro, wondering why we were commemorating the fall of a wicked, genocidal anti-Semite by dancing to the Village People.

As global anti-Semitism makes headlines, we might be well-advised to pause and reflect on the threats our people have faced over the millennia. It is easy to mythologize and market Purim. But there are more important issues to consider than prune versus poppyseed.

Purim is an ideal time to contemplate the theology of miracles. Was the saving of the Jews in the Purim story a miracle? What is a miracle? Do we see miracles today?

What is the role of the Jewish community in a multicultural world? How do we successfully communicate tolerance and acceptance? How do we best respond today to anti-Semitism and other forms of hatred and bigotry?

Beyond a colourful celebration, Purim should serve as a trigger for discussion and a sobering reminder of the current troubling wave of anti-Semitism. If Purim is only a noisy, sticky carnival, what are we learning and what are we teaching?

My goal this Purim is to share some thoughts with my candy-covered kids about what Purim means. At their ages, the message will be simple – respect all people regardless of their background; it's important to be proud to be Jewish; and don't touch anything after the Purim carnival until you wash with soap.

And now back to our regularly scheduled programming…

Chag Samayach.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Manaus

Ten black-and-white photographs of the men who have been president of the Comite Israelita Do Amazonas since 1929 adorn the 2004 calendar of that organization, based in the Brazilian city of Manaus. By no coincidence, nine of the individuals, including Raphael Benoliel and Jose Laredo, are Sephardi.

Sheldon Kirshner in Brazil

The Jewish community in the state of Amazonas, the largest in the Amazonia region, is composed primarily of Jews whose ancestors arrived from Morocco in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, just in time to tap into the brief rubber boom.

Manaus, the sultry capital of Amazonas, sprawls along the northern bank of the Rio Negro, a tributary of the mighty Amazon River. Seven hundred and fifty of its 1.5 million inhabitants are Jewish, and among them are Catholic converts to Judaism and Christians of Jewish origin who have returned to the fold.

Rubber, a highly-prized commodity, originally lured Moroccan Jews to the immense Amazon rainforest. At the height of the boom, when Brazil was the world's sole supplier, Jews played an integral role in the rubber trade as middlemen and traders.

"One became rich by plunging deeper into the jungle, reaching new territories as yet unexploited," writes Harvard University's Susan Gilson Miller in a monograph entitled Kippur on the Amazon. "His canoe laden with goods, the Jewish trader would become an explorer, following tributaries where no one had previously ventured, hoping that Indians would come to the banks of the river to exchange rubber, quinine, vanilla, cocoa and other natural products for his trinkets, knives, axes and cloth."

The tomb of Rabbi Shalom Imanuel Muyal

These traders galvanized Jews back in Morocco. As Miller puts it: "Moroccan Jews migrated to many parts of South America, but it was the emigration to the Amazon that most completely captured the communal imagination. Jungle adventures were the substance of letters, oral histories, written accounts and even fiction. The jungle was the place of exotic flora and fauna that threatened the voyager and haunted his imagination: fierce jaguars that appeared suddenly in the night, giant boa constrictors that could kill with the thrash of the tail, prehistoric crocodiles and turtles, vampire bats that sucked a man's blood soundlessly and painlessly in his sleep, huge tapirs that could easily trample a canoe and sink its precious contents."

Such stories are the stuff of legend in Manaus' insular Jewish community, which has grown incrementally over the past three decades, spurred by the establishment of a free trade zone in Manaus in 1967 and by the recent explosion of global interest in ecotourism.

Issac Dahan, the past president of the Comite Israelita do Amazonas, said that the advent of prosperity triggered an exodus of Jews from Argentina, Sao Paulo (Brazil's commercial centre), Israel and even Poland into Manaus, which degenerated into a backwater after the rubber boom. "Manaus was isolated in the past, and travel was more difficult," he added through interpreter Janet Israel, an English teacher in a private school. "This is no longer true."

Only five hours by air from Miami, Manaus may be an obscure and exotic place to most North Americans, but in Brazil, it is heralded as the gateway to jungle adventures in Amazonas. And to Brazilian Jews, Manaus is known as a bastion of Judaism in the wilderness. Last year, the Jewish community here, which has preserved Moroccan customs and traditions, marked the passage of one wedding, six brit milas, four bar mitzvahs and 15 bat milas.

Manaus' synagogue, Beit Ya'acov/Rabbi Meyr, boasts a 400-year-old Sepher Torah, and the afternoon Jewish school has an enrollment of 60 students. The modern community centre, where weddings, bar mitzvahs and communal events take place, is equipped with a swimming pool, a children's wading pool and an enclosed soccer field. The engraved names on the tombstones in the Jewish cemetery remind visitors of the community's Moroccan antecedents.

Manaus had a rabbi, Jacobo Azulay, from the 1930s until his death in 1976. But since then, five rabbis have been hired and fired in revolving-door style, and today, the city is without a rabbi. Dahan, a burly physician, fills in as rabbi and cantor. His CD, Canto Judaica na Amazonia, a medley of traditional Jewish prayers, attests to his skills as a chazzan.

Asked why Manaus has not had a permanent rabbi for the last 28 years, Dahan replied, "We're very diverse in terms of religious beliefs and observances, and if we had a rabbi, there would be divisions and we would not be as strong and united. When a rabbi is required, we send for one."

The unspoken reason for the absence of a permanent rabbi may turn on the fact that about 70 per cent of the community's weddings are intermarriages. Celso Neves Assayag, the current president of the Comite Israelita Do Amazonas, exemplifies the tolerant, easygoing attitude toward race and religion in Manaus: his mother was Catholic, as is his wife.

For Assayag and many of his fellow Jews in Manaus, most of whose residents are of mixed Portuguese and Indian origin, intermarriage is so common that it is not regarded as a problem. But in a nod to critics, he observed that his wife keeps a Jewish home and is active in the community, and that they have raised their children as Jews.

In a country where Third World poverty is endemic, and where the national average monthly income is about $80 (US), the Jews of Manaus have not fared too badly. According to Assayag, a food wholesaler, the vast majority of Jews here earn about $180 per month, just enough to pay the bills and survive, but not enough to own a fancy home, drive a new car or vacation abroad. In a reference to Brazil's lack of a Canadian-style social welfare system, he said, "They can't afford to get sick." But if a member of the community cannot cover the expense of, say, a bar mitzvah or a funeral, the Comite Israelita Do Amazonas steps in and absorbs the cost. No Jews, however, are so destitute that they must dwell in palafidas, the shantytowns on stilts that blight Manaus.

Assayag estimates that one-quarter of the Jews are reasonably affluent, while five or six families are outright millionaires. "They're the pillars of the community," said Israel. "They help the others."

Anti-Semitism is rare in Manaus, and the Jewish cemetery has never been desecrated. "Baruch Hashem," sighed Dahan."Jews are very respected," said Daniel Foinquinos de Melo, a 20-year-old medical student. "We have good relations with everyone."

But after the outbreak of the current Palestinian uprising in September 2000, local Palestinians staged a march in support of the intifadah, burning an Israeli flag and stoning several Jewish-owned shops. Since then, the Palestinians of Manaus, said to number in the vicinity of 3,000, have remained quiet.

The fallout of the Arab-Israeli conflict also affected Janet Israel. A Palestinian mother, heatedly objecting to Israel's surname, pulled her daughter out of Israel's school. But as Dahan pointed out, Jews have maintained cordial relations with the old Lebanese Arab mercantile community.

The state of Israel remains a strong focus of Jewish identity here. Five Jewish students, including Saulo Foinquinos, 23, have visited Israel through the Birthright program. And in the past few years, 80 Jews have made aliyah.

Manaus may be the only city on earth where local Catholics revere the memory of a rabbi. In 1910, during the rubber boom, a rabbi from Jerusalem, Shalom Imanuel Muyal, arrived in Manaus to collect alms from the Moroccan Jews. After Muyal's sudden death, and his burial in the Sao Joao Batista cemetery, which adjoins the Beit HaChaim Jewish cemetery, Catholics began placing pebbles and flowers on his tombstone. To this day, they regarded Muyal as a miracle worker, and while Jews have no idea why Muyal is so beloved by Catholics, they gamely accept his status as a saint.

Outside Manaus, Amazonia is home to upwards of 2,000 Jews. Belem, with the largest and oldest Jewish community in the region, has twice as many Jews as Manaus. One thousand six hundred kilometres east of Manaus, Belem is in the state of Para, where the yellowish waters of the Amazon River meet the cobalt waters of the Atlantic Ocean.

Throughout the rest of Amazonia, in cities ranging from Macapa and Rio Branco to Porto Velho and Santarem, there are a handful of Jewish families. And in some towns, such as Alenquer and Itacoatiara, one of whose mayors was Jewish, the Jews have completely vanished, ending a chapter in Amazonian Jewish history.

Jewish Life

The Passion's timing teaches lessons

By RABBI MENDEL KAPLAN

Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ has elicited mixed views since its initial showings to private audiences several months ago. While garnering rave reviews from Christian laypeople and clergy, it has concerned many Jews who have either seen the picture or learned of its content from the media.

Rabbinic Reflections

At the core of the firestorm is the understandable Jewish fear of a renewal of base, blatant anti-Semitism, which has already raised its ugly head in Europe. Will this factually inaccurate film mark the beginning of a reversal of Vatican II and the re-acceptance of the nefarious, age-old accusation of deicide, a defamatory charge that has brought untold anguish and bloodshed upon the Jewish people for nearly two millennia, culminating in the Holocaust?

With anti-Semitism reaching levels that haven't been seen since the 1930s, the release of The Passion comes at a dangerous time. This gut- wrenching, emotionally charged and graphic illustration of deicide and the Jews may very well inflame the anti-Israel rhetoric infused in today's anti-Semitism, giving it renewed vigour and boding ill not only for the Jews but for much of humanity.

The question on the minds of so many Jews is how to create an effective counterbalance to the film? Some Jews have suggested a strong cinematic response and the development of educational programs to teach the masses about the contradictions within the four Gospels. Others maintain that our wisest response would be none at all, that the less attention we give to the matter, the less damaging it will be.

Although I make no claim to being a spiritually enlightened visionary, I was taught by my mentor, the Lubavitcher Rebbe, that the solutions to modern-day conundrums can be found in biblically documented responses to similar situations written by those who were prophetically charged and divinely inspired.

While contemplating possible responses to this deeply troubling film, it dawned on me that the dubious timing of its release might itself provide us with the answer. Gibson and his supporters are unaware that the film debuted on public screens across North America in the Jewish month of Adar. Ever since the first Purim 2,357 years ago, Adar has traditionally been considered a time of good fortune for Am Yisrael and more specifically, the most propitious time for success in dealing with our mortal enemies. Ever since Haman selected the month of Adar (through a lottery system known as the "pur" – the origin of the name Purim) for his carefully planned genocide of ancient Jewry, it has been referred to as the "hachodesh asher nehepach lachem," the month in which the diabolical designs of our enemies backfired, leading to their own destruction.

But the miracles and divine salvation of yesteryear did not happen by themselves. Our Sages teach us that due to the inspired leadership of Mordechai, the Jewish people responded to the impending doom not by trying to curry favour with their enemies and the general populace, but rather by reaffirming their faith in God.

The Midrash teaches that for the better part of a year, the Jewish communities throughout ancient Persia made an incredible return to the traditions and teachings of Moses and Sinai. They rededicated themselves to the study of Torah and the performance of mitzvot and openly expressed their Jewish pride.

By now, a clear lesson should emerge. A muted response to Gibson's Passion brings to mind the "ostrich syndrome," which denies reality and has historically led to negative outcomes. However, ingratiating ourselves to those who despise us will also not save the day.

Gibson's film must be met head on and countered with a passion of our own. A newfound quest for knowledge of the Torah and an awareness of what it truly means to be a Jew is essential for our survival. We must affirm that we are indeed a people that acknowledges God's supremacy. Those who have already developed a passion for Torah Judaism must now demonstrate a passion for reaching out and inspiring a return among our brethren, regardless of their present observance or affiliation.

Let us respond to any insidious attack of a modern-day Haman with the same unified conviction and devotion we displayed in days of old. By remembering and being guided by the Torah lessons of history, we will once again experience miracles and redemption, God's mighty deeds and saving acts.

Rabbi Kaplan is spiritual leader of Chabad@Flamingo in Thornhill, Ont., and serves as a chaplain with the York Regional Police.

Put vehicle checks by Israel in context

MYTH:

Israel prevents Palestinian ambulances from taking sick and injured Palestinians to hospitals.

FACT:

One of the results of the intifadah's violence has been allegations of abuse against Palestinian Red Crescent ambulances by Israeli soldiers who, it is alleged, have caused inconveniences, medical complications and even death to sick passengers. These accounts tend to portray delays as wanton acts of cruelty by Israel against Palestinians in need of medical attention.

These allegations are correct in one regard: ambulances are indeed stopped and searched at Israeli checkpoints. But the accusations fail to put the facts into a broader context. The reason ambulances have been held and searched at checkpoints is due to the very real threat they pose to Israel and its citizens. Ambulances have frequently been used as a means to transport bombs, and many terrorists responsible for suicide bombings in Israel got inside the country by driving or riding in Red Crescent ambulances.

For example, in October 2001, Nidal Nazal, a Hamas operative in Kalkilya, was arrested by the Israel Defence Forces (IDF). It was found that the ambulance driver for the Palestinian Red Crescent had exploited the unrestricted travel rule reserved for medical personnel to serve as a messenger between the Hamas headquarters in several West Bank towns.

In January 2002, Wafa Idris blew herself up on the crowded Jaffa Street in Jerusalem, becoming one of the first female suicide bombers. She was an ambulance driver for the Palestinian Red Crescent, as was Mohammed Hababa, the Tanzim operative who sent her on her mission. She left the West Bank by way of an ambulance.

On March 27, 2002, a Tanzim member who worked as a Red Crescent ambulance driver was captured with explosives in his ambulance. A child disguised as a patient was riding in the ambulance along with the child's family. The explosives were found under the stretcher the "sick" child was lying on.

On May 17, 2002, an explosive belt was found in a Red Crescent ambulance at a checkpoint near Ramallah. The bomb, the same type generally used in suicide bombings, was hidden under a gurney carrying a sick child. The driver, Islam Jibril, was already wanted by the IDF, and admitted this was not the first time an ambulance had been used to transport explosives or terrorists.

The bomb was removed from the ambulance and detonated in the presence of a representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) In a statement issued the same day, the ICRC said it "understands the security concerns of the Israeli authorities, and has always acknowledged their right to check ambulances, provided it does not unduly delay medical evacuations." The sick passengers in the ambulance were escorted by soldiers to a nearby hospital.

On June 30, 2002, Israeli troops found 10 suspected Palestinian terrorists hiding in two ambulances in Ramallah. They were caught when soldiers stopped the vehicles for routine checks.

In December 2003, Rashed Tarek al-Nimr, who worked as a chemist in hospitals in Nablus and Bethlehem, supplied chemicals from the hospitals to Hamas for use in making bombs and admitted he used ambulances to transport the chemicals. He also said Hamas commanders would hide in hospitals to avoid arrest.

The accusations levelled against Israel by its critics have frequently been based on statements of international law, such as the Fourth Geneva Convention. It is true that the Geneva Convention emphasizes the immunity and neutrality of ambulances and emergency medical personnel. But the notion that Israel must ignore a clear and present danger to its citizens or else violate international law, is a distortion. By using ambulances to smuggle explosives into Israel, the Palestinian terrorists are compromising the Red Crescent's immunity and neutrality.

Thoughts on war and peace

Books
Bernard Baskin

The 20th century began with optimism – the spread of a humane and scientific outlook would lead to the fading away, not only of war, but also of other forms of cruelty and barbarism. In the light of these expectations, the century of Hitler, Stalin, Pol Pot and Saddam came as an unforeseen calamity. Volcanoes, thought extinct, turned out to be still active.

And war seems, more and more, like an incurable disease. Look just at the 1990s: two million dead in Afghanistan; 1.5 million dead in the Sudan; some 800,000 butchered in 90 days in Rwanda; a half-million dead in Angola; a quarter-million dead in Bosnia; 200,000 dead in Guatemala; 150,000 dead in Liberia; a quarter of a million dead in Burundi; 75,000 dead in Algeria. This does not include the smaller, but no less deadly, conflicts in a dozen other places around the globe. In the wars of the 20th century, 62 million civilians have perished, nearly 20 million more than the 43 million actually killed in battle.

In Humanity, A Moral History of the Twentieth Century, Jonathan Glover writes, "Journalists risk their lives to let us know the terrible things that are being dong while we live in relative security. Victims painfully narrate their experiences so that we may understand. Often they do this in the belief that, if the world hear, there will be an outcry and something will be done. Ed Vulliamy, who reported the war in Bosnia, wrote:

'Most of us thought we could make a difference, at first. It seemed incredible that the world could watch, read and hear about what was happening to the victim people of this war, and yet do nothing – and worse. As it turned out, we went unheeded by the diplomats and on occasions were even cursed by the political leaders.'"

A more recent example of world indifference is the unspeakable bloodletting in Rwanda that left the United Nations unmoved despite the frenzied entreaties of Canada's Gen. Romeo Dallaire and others.

Why is it that our machinery for helping people to live together amicably is still as creaking and rudimentary as it was 2,500 years ago when the Athenians and the Spartans devastated each other in a war that meant nothing and settled nothing? All the lessons learned by philosophers, social scientists, economists, psychologists and historians in the intervening years have not moved us much closer to the rational resolution of national conflicts.

But there is a basic difference between today and yesterday: modern technology means that the decisions of a few men, fanatical or demented, can mean horror and death for untold millions.

It may be a limp cliché, but it bears repeating: imagine what the hundreds of billions spent for armament could mean in terms of improving the human condition in every corner of the globe. Why should so much of our intelligence, cunning and resources go toward creating a war apparatus and so little go toward solving common problems?

Is it possible in God's economy that the history of the human race should prove to be nothing more than the story of an ape playing with a box of matches on top of a petrol dump?

Purim, Esther and the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Once upon a time, there was a woman named Esther and her uncle Mordechai. They stopped a bad man named Haman from killing many Jews. That's why we celebrate Purim.

If that's the depth at which you were taught the story of Purim, boy are you in for a shock! Megillat Esther tells a tale of court intrigue and deliverance by God that is complicated, puzzling and profound. You can easily delve into the deeper meaning of Megillat Esther commentaries thanks to the World Wide Web.

In "The Upside-Down World of Megillat Esther," Rabbi Yoel Bin-Nun asks some difficult questions. Why was a story "devoid of any sacred material," one that doesn't even mention God's name, included among the holy books of the Tanach? He suggests that having a story in which God does not overtly appear actually teaches us an important lesson. Even when it seemed as if God is out of the picture, He still facilitated the Jewish victory.

Rabbi Bin-Nun then asks another question. How could Esther, a daughter of Israel, enter the Royal Chambers? Why isn't "her coerced participation in the contest of beauty and sexual appeal … described as a tragedy and a horrifying nightmare?" You'll have to read the article for the answer to that one [www.vbm-torah.org/purim.htm].

A page titled "Feminist Aspects of Megillat Esther" examines the actions of the strong female characters Esther and Vashti. When Vashti dares to refuse to appear before her husband the king at his feast, her "action endangers the status of men in the empire… they therefore decide to react with the utmost severity, to warn other women in the empire not to emulate her example." Later, we see how Mordechai considered Esther a full partner in saving the Jews and convinced her to accept her mission despite the risks. "From Mordechai's words, it emerges clearly that everyone – man or woman – has a mission in life which he or she has to accept, and that every member of the people of Israel has a duty to preserve the existence of the people by the means available to him or her. Esther responds to Mordechai's appeal and from that moment forth, the initiative passes to her – and she alone plans and implements all the steps that lead ultimately to the salvation of Israel" [www.jafi.org.il/education/festivls/purim/pureng3.html].

More online commentaries include ones by Yitzchak Etshalom [www.vbm-torah.org/purim/pur-es.htm], Rabbi Moshe Bogomilsky [http://makeashorterlink.com/?D26D16777] and Bonna Devora Haberman, whose article "Unmasking the Scroll of Esther" first appeared in Tikkun magazine [http://makeashorterlink.com/?T19D12777].

If you can't wait until Purim night to hear the Megillah for real, you can have a private audience at home as Cantor Rabinovitz chants all one hour and 18 minutes of it to you [www.613.org/purim.html]. If you'd like to follow along, check out the online version of the Megillah presented at Mechon Mamre.

Every verse is printed in Hebrew next to the corresponding English translation [www.mechon-mamre.org/p/pt/pt3301.htm] (If you have trouble viewing Hebrew with your regular browser, use the free Mozilla browser [www.mozilla.org/]).

Meanwhile, the kids can listen to a corny yet entertaining 20 minute dramatized version of the Megillah at the Tzivos Hashem website [http://makeashorterlink.com/?Y31D41777]. Rabbi Shraga Simmons provides less corn but more detail in his summary of the Purim story at the Aish Hatorah site [www.aish.com/holidays/purim/ganza_megillah.asp].

Parts of the Purim story may sound strange to our modern ears. That's probably why some witty person created the Politically Correct Megillah, Here's a summary of Chapter VIII: "That day, the king gave Esther Haman's house, and she told the king that Mordechai was her uncle. And Mordechai asked the king's permission for the Jews to rise up and kill their enemies. But Esther would have no such thing, and instead, she arranged for a dialogue between the Jewish leaders and the leaders of the people of Shushan. And while they couldn't overcome all their differences, they did agree to joint-author a letter of mutual acceptance and tolerance" [www.jr.co.il/humor/purim09.txt].

Presumably, they lived happily ever after.

Support group helps parents deal with kids' behaviour

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Stephanie Wagman credits the Association of Parent Support Groups in Ontario (APSGO) for turning her life around.

As a last resort, she joined the self-help organization for parents of youth who act out when her now 32-year-old daughter was about 15.

A former president of the organization, she still attends weekly meetings and acts as its spokesperson.

As well as holding the meetings run by parent volunteers, APSGO operates a 24-hour referral line, organizes seminars and workshops, publishes an information newsletter, and provides a forum for communication between parents, professional organizations and Ontario government ministries.

"If people are concerned about their child's behaviour, then we are the right place for them. Generally, however, we are talking about behaviour that surpasses the bounds of normal teenage rebellion.

"We are talking about people who feel they have lost control of their own lives and homes – homes in which the acting out adolescent can run the show," she says.

When her own daughter was about 13, says Wagman, "she went to school one day and someone else came home in her body.

"Whereas she had been a delightful child, she became moody, withdrawn and uncommunicative. She would lie to me and I would rarely know where she was."

At 15, her daughter moved out to live with her father and then ultimately her boyfriend. "I didn't hear from her for two years, but I worked hard to either get ready for a relationship with her, or learn how to cope if I would not have a relationship."

She found APSGO, she says, by looking in the phone book. "I am not a joiner, but I was compelled by great need. Life was unbearable and I had nowhere else to turn."

When she attended her first meeting, she noticed that people were happy to see each other. "I saw that they could still laugh despite their situation and I knew that they had something to teach me."

The members provide hope, encouragement and parenting strategy in a non-blaming atmosphere, she says.

"Even now that my daughter is an adult, I find that each meeting is a refresher. We never tell people what to do, we point out what we think about things.

"[We have come to realize] that when we change our behaviour, ultimately, other behaviours will change."

Nancy Gold (not her real name) joined APSGO because she was looking for strategies to deal with her son, now 18.

"This was a kid who did not have the words 'yes' or 'OK' in his vocabulary. He was totally non-compliant.

"We tried different therapies, and he even lived in a group home. Finally a psychiatrist suggested we look into APSGO."

The organization's philosophy is based on the book How to Deal with Your Acting-up Teenager: Practical Self-Help for Desperate Parents by Robert Bayard and Jean Bayard, Gold says.

"I joined about one year ago, and I feel far less hopeless now than I did then," she says.

"Basically I've learned how to diffuse fights and learn which issues are between us, and which issues are his alone.

"School, for example, is between the kids and the school, and we learn to ask the school how they will handle the problem."

In her son's case, she says, they gave him a deadline to get a job or leave the house.

"He left to live on the street. Our daughter could not understand why we allowed that, but we were not doing him a favour by supporting him. The bottom line is that he is going to pick his own road, and we have to trust that he'll do what is right for him."

Group members call each other every week, Gold says, and they can call anyone 24 hours a day. "Everything is confidential, and no one is embarrassed about their situation.

"We are there for ourselves. We're learning how to cope, and eventually our son will change his behaviour because we have changed ours."

There are people whose children have made a complete turn-around, says Gold, "and [the parents] still come every week."

APSGO literature tells parents the group may be for them if, among other reasons, family routines are frequently upset by their child's acting out, they have considered calling the police for fear of physical abuse, they tell lies to cover up for their child's negative behaviour, they are frequently hurt by their actions or attitude, or they feel frightened by what might happen to them and their child.

Call APSGO at 416-223-7444, 1-800-488-5666 or visit www.apsgo.ca.

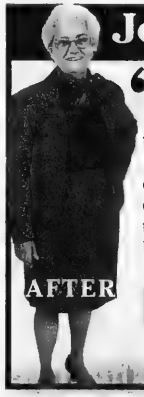
Josephine Hageman loses 51 lbs. "thanks to hypnosis"!



"I had been overweight for 30 years. I was unhealthy, unhappy and downright miserable. Until I was hypnotized and lost five dress sizes!

Dieting had been my life story. I was the queen of the yo-yo diet. My uncontrollable cravings got worse with every diet. I thought about hypnosis, but I was skeptical. Until I walked into Positive Changes.

My consultant never pressured me. Never asked me to buy anything. I decided to give it a try.

When I first started, I desperately wanted to lose 40 lbs. Now I have taken off 51 lbs. in nine easy months.

72 Years Young. I know you may be skeptical of hypnosis. I sure was. Until I experienced it first hand. Now I'm a 72-year-young lady thanks to hypnosis!"

Walk through history at the Great Jewish Expo

The Great Jewish Expo, making its first appearance in Toronto, "allows visitors to walk through 2,000 years of Jewish history," says Toronto co-ordinator Rabbi Yonah Vilenkin.

The show, which is on a North American tour, will be here from March 9 to March 15 at La Vedette Banquets, 150 Rivermede Rd. in Vaughan. It is hosted by Tzivos Hashem Canada, an arm of Chabad Lubavitch that provides programming for children.

The Great Jewish Expo promises an overview of Jewish history, holidays and practices. The multi-faceted show includes robotics, moving dioramas, multi-media and animated scenes, and aqua sculpture.

Participants who take the tour of the 10,0000-square-foot maze of exhibits will experience such moments in history as Creation, the exile in Egypt, the construction of the First Temple and even a clandestine seder during Nazi times.

People in period costume take part in a Jewish wedding, and children can measure the impact of their good deeds by activating the "Moving Clock of Redemption."

After the tour, youngsters can do arts and crafts or take part in a game show that tests them on what they have seen.

"In today's information age, it is important to utilize all available resources to provide our children and community with a wholesome Jewish experience," Rabbi Vilenkin said.

"The same technology that makes today's television shows, computer games and movies so irresistible, are employed by the Great Jewish Expo to create an atmosphere of fun and understanding for our children, so they can feel proud about their heritage."

General admission is $7 per person. The group rate for a minimum of 10 people is $5 per person.

Expo is open to the public March 9 and 11 from 7 to 9 p.m., and March 14 from 1 to 5 p.m. Group tours are available by appointment March 9 to 12, from 9 a.m.

For more information, call Rabbi Vilenkin at 416-661-0650, or go visit the website www.tzivoshashem.ca.

PROMOTING RELIGIOUS HARMONY: The graduating class of United Synagogue Day Schools Bathurst campus played host to a panel of three religious leaders at its Rosh Chodesh Adar Beit Midrash program. The focus of the program was promoting religious harmony. The three panelists were: Father Terry Gullagher, Imam Muhamad Zahid and Rabbi David Seed. Judy Csillag represented the Canadian Council of Christian and Jews and acted as moderator. The students had the opportunity to ask questions, and to gain insight into the main principles that guide Christianity and Islam. Students said that the three religions did not seem very different, and that this could be a tool for peace among all people in the world. Canadian Hillel students in Israel prepare for The Hague

By DANIEL HELD

As the International Court of Justice in The Hague heard arguments on the legality of Israel's security fence last week, Canadian Jewish students from Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Ottawa joined others to protest the use of the court as a Palestinian propaganda tool to ostracize Israel.

But more than that – we, a group of students studying in Israel – shared in the important responsibility of preparing the posters, materials and messages for the demonstrations.

Lined across the tables and chairs, along the floor and out into the hallway, were 927 pictures, names and stories- each representing just one Israeli victim of terror.

From our first days on campus the concepts were drilled into us. Israel advocacy and hasbara (public relations) became our cry. Through seminars and workshops, weekend retreats and 'lunch and learns,' Hillel gave us both the tools and the passion to stand up for Israel, defending the country we love. As Nikki Greenspan, former president of Hillel @ York said, "our dedication to Israel does not stop at the end of a Hillel program, it continues beyond in our heart and actions." This passion brought each of us to Israel and drove us to volunteer our time at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, aiding in their preparations for The Hague.

I will never forget walking into the room for the first time. While often we hear about terrorism and its victims, seeing the piles upon piles of pictures brought the situation to a new reality. As we began our work, we slowly read through the stories. "Each victim has a name, a history and a future that was taken away from him. Seeing the pictures, reading their stories and reflecting on their lives was an emotional journey," said Ariel Greenbaum-Shinder an Ottawa native and Hillel scholar at Hebrew University.

The magnitude of the job, including the sheer number of pictures brought perspective to the importance of our work, both in helping with preparations for The Hague and in continuing to defend Israel on campus. Activism does not stop with a poster or a march; it does not end by signing a petition or attending a rally. Activism is a function of love. We love Israel and therefore we stand with Israel. We stand with Israel and, therefore, we will not allow it to be maligned in The Hague or on campus. Our work in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was not heroics. We simply pasted stories to pictures. But at the end of the day, we found our way to contribute.

The 927 posters were carried through the streets of The Hague as a procession of Jewish students marched on the Peace Palace where the International Court of Justice is holding hearings on Israel's security fence. The signs were accompanied by eight we had not been able to prepare- those representing the victims of the Jerualem Bus 14 bombing on February 22.

May there one day be no more pictures to add and no more Hagues for which to prepare.

Daniel Held, a student in the Jewish Teacher Education Program at York University, is spending a year studying abroad at The Hebrew University in Jerusalem. In Toronto, he served as the Israel Affairs Coordinator at Hillel @ York and as an active advocate for Israel. Hillel of Greater Toronto, supported by UJA Federation, is the voice of Jewish students on campus.

A chance to discover options in Jewish education

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Important questions will be answered next week as parents of pre-schoolers participate in the Options in Jewish Education program.

Co-sponsored by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education and its Jewish Information Service, the program – scheduled for Tuesday, March 9 at 7:30 p.m. at the Lipa Green Building (4600 Bathurst Street) - will tackle a number of issues designed to help parents make an informed decision about the educational future of their children.

Subjects to be covered include: tips on choosing a Jewish day school versus a Jewish after-school (supplementary) education program; the range of choices available throughout the GTA; special programs for special needs students, and both the costs and benefits of various options.

"Jewish education is the strategic plan of the Jewish community," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, Executive Director, UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, and the evening's keynote speaker. "The purpose of this particular evening is for young parents to find their way into that plan. The decision that they make at this point in their lives about the education of their children will have consequences for generations to come. It is hoped that UJA can help parents make that decision based on good information and discussion rather than myths."

For Toronto's Carolin and Howard Cohen, this program could not have come at a better time.

"We'll definitely be there," says Carolin, the mother of three children from 22 months to 5 years of age. "We want to make sure that we know all our options about Jewish education for our kids. We definitely want to make sure we cover all the bases before making a decision."

The Cohen's two older children; Alexa, 5, and Lauren, 3 both attend a Toronto Jewish school, but according to Carolin, parents can never have too much information.

"My husband Howard and I still have important decisions to make about the girls' futures, and about my youngest, Adam, too. It's important to get the answers; the right answers, and it's important to take advantage of opportunities such as this program."

Mindy Soudack, the mother of two children, with another on the way in September, believes that Options in Jewish Education is a crucial program.

"To be honest, I'm nervous about the choices we make for our kids' futures," she says. "The decision about how to educate my children is a life-altering decision for the kids, and I don't want to make a bad choice. I'm looking forward to hearing about all the options out there from the experts, and also, I want to meet and hear other parents who have the same choices to make. We all want what's best for our children, so we're going to exhaust every avenue available within Toronto's Jewish education system."

For more information and to RSVP, call 416.635.5600 or email: jinfo@ujafed.org

The Options in Jewish Education program will provide parents of pre-schoolers with the information needed to make informed choices about their children's education.

Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at U of T opens its doors

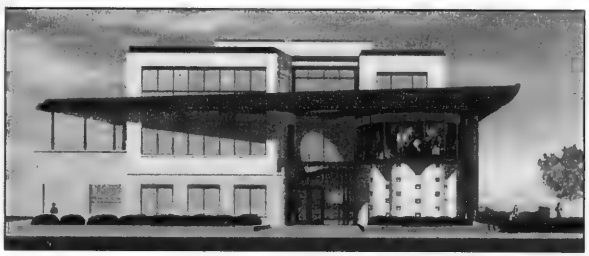
By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

A new chapter in Jewish life for downtown Toronto university students was launched this week with the official opening of The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto.

Situated in the heart of the U of T campus at the corner of Harbord and Huron, the new spacious, multifunctional facility offers a home away from home for close to 4,000 Jewish students who attend the university.

The new facility – a project of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative – offers a wide range of innovative educational, cultural and social programs. It also houses a fully staffed and equipped Israel advocacy department.

"The Centre meets the growing critical need among Jewish students to be engaged in Jewish life through a wide array of campus-based activities," says Zac Kaye, Executive Director of Hillel of Greater Toronto. "By offering students a secure and nurturing environment in which to grow, we are in essence strengthening their ties to the community and to Israel."



The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto officially opened its doors to students on March 1.

Although the move for students to their new home is only a few days old, Lisa Isen Baumal, Director of the Wolfond Centre, can already feel a new and stronger Jewish pulse on campus.

"The Wolfond Centre has created huge excitement amongst Jewish students here at U of T," says Isen Baumal. "It is so wonderful to see students get so excited and energized when they walk into the building. Some of our more involved students have been giving their friends tours of the building, and they talk about it with such pride."

"We are tremendously excited to have the new Wolfond Centre on the U of T Campus," says Johanna Herman, 22, a fourth-year student at the university. "The new Israel Advocacy Centre will be a great resource for students to get current information about the conflict in Israel. It will provide them with a place to generate ideas and discussion about how to promote Israel in a positive way."

The centre also includes a student common room, resource rooms, a spiritual centre, a fireplace lounge, and an outdoor patio/garden. It's a far cry from the old cramped quarters in a basement at University College.

"The Wolfond Centre is a beautiful building," says Alex Green, a 19-year-old second-year student at U of T, studying political science and history. "It will be the hub of Jewish life on campus and within the downtown Jewish community. The new centre will create a location for Jewish students to relax and meet other Jewish students. The location and potential of this new centre is something that never existed at the U of T before."

The new Wolfond Centre is the first full-service facility for Jewish students at the U of T in nearly three decades.

From the Chair

The story behind the numbers

By LESLIE GALES
Chair, UJA Federation

Leslie Gales

On the surface, they may seem dry and lifeless, but figures from the 2001 census, which we, at UJA Federation are now analysing, tell the story of a Toronto Jewish community in the midst of dramatic, historic change.

In 1921, nearly 35,000 Jews lived in Toronto – virtually all of them downtown. Today, there are close to 21,000 Jews downtown alone, representing just over 11% of a Jewish population totalling at least 180,000 in the Greater Toronto area. Our Jewish population has grown by 518% since the first census statistics available in 1921.

Back then, we lived in a tight, compact downtown district. Today, distinct Jewish neighbourhoods flourish for over 40 kilometres from south to north, where in York Region, some 60,000 Jews have formed Canada's fastest growing Jewish community.

Not only are we blessed with the challenge of ongoing growth, our community members are living longer. The proportion of Jews in Toronto age 65 and older is higher than the proportion of non-Jewish seniors in our city. At the opposite end, about 20% of our Jewish population is under 14 years old.

These figures not only illustrate one of the world's most thriving Jewish communities, but also a community that must quickly and creatively accommodate rapid growth and the needs of a population that is getting younger and older at the same time.

UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative is a powerful response to these trends. We're proud to be the catalyst for renovating and rebuilding Jewish community facilities downtown, in the central Bathurst-Sheppard region and in Vaughan, north of Steeles, on an unprecedented scale. In fact, our board recently approved the second phase of renovations at the beautiful, new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre adorning the corner of Bloor and Spadina.

Our annual campaign, which is projected to close at $60 million, is another way in which we ensure that core community needs can be met through existing programs and innovative, new solutions.

But we are counting on your ideas as well and we would like to hear from you. Send us your thoughts, question or suggestions about the issues we face by e-mailing to chair@ujafed.org. In the meantime, let's be thankful for the community that we have built and the exceptional city that has allowed us to flourish.

Cuban reunion for birthright israel alumni

Seven young people from Toronto's Jewish community recently flew to Cuba, to reconnect with some old friends while also delivering humanitarian aid to Havana's Jewish community of 900 people.

The trip, made possible by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and UIA Federations Canada, reintroduced members of Toronto's Jewish community to Cuban Jews who met each other in Israel last August when the Cubans made history by participating in the birthright israel program.

As it turned out, however, the four-day visit was much more than a reunion. It was about making new connections with Cuban Jewry, and making a difference in their lives.

The Toronto contingent brought large bags of medical supplies, from aspirin and cold medicines to bandages and allergy medications, as well as 70 pairs of shoes. They also became immersed in Cuba's Jewish life by volunteering for a variety of causes, including the restoration of an old synagogue, visits to the elderly in their own homes, and putting together Passover gift baskets.

"While the initial goal of our visit was to maintain and strengthen the ties we established in Israel last August, we ended up meeting so many young Cuban Jews who took us in as their own and introduced us to their community," says Lisa Ain, a participant on the original birthright israel trip, and this one. "The Cuban Jewish community may be small, but it is incredibly passionate and dedicated."

"During those 10 days in Israel last August, Canadian and Cuban Jews came together like a big family," says Cuban William Miller, 27, one of the Cuban birthright israel delegation leaders, whose grandfather, Jose Miller, is the president of Cuba's Jewish community. "Now, six month later, we received our bothers and sisters form Canada who joined with us as part of the Jewish community in Havana," says Miller.

"We visited the Patronato Jewish Community Centre where they have Sunday school classes for kids from three to 17 years of age," adds Ain. "All the kids there, especially the really young ones, were singing Hebrew songs, and having such a wonderful time. It's clear that they are excited about their Judaism."

Ashkenazi Jews with Type 1 diabetes sought for study in Toronto

By ABIGAIL TATOR

Special to The CJN

Researchers at the University Health Network are looking for Ashkenazi Jews with Type 1 diabetes to help them track genes that may predispose people with diabetes to develop complications.

The aim of the study is to find out why some people with diabetes develop complications such as blindness, kidney and heart disease, while others do not.

"A lot of diabetics get these conditions after having long-term diabetes," said principal investigator Dr. Andrew Boright, an assistant professor of medicine at the University of Toronto.

"We want to see if there is something to predispose people with diabetes to these complications. For example, only 30 per cent will get kidney disease. Even some with high blood sugar or poor control problems don't develop complications. So clearly there must be genes that put some patients at risk, otherwise everyone would get them."

Now in its second year, 65 patients have participated in the study, funded by the Canadian Diabetes Association in collaboration with Mount Sinai Hospital. But Boright and collaborator Bernard Zinman, director of leadership at the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes at Mount Sinai Hospital, hope for at least 150 participants.

To participate, you must be 18 or older and have had Type 1 diabetes for at least 10 years, and you must be of Ashkenazi Jewish ethnic background and already have complications.

The researchers will also contact participants' parents and siblings who are non-diabetic to learn their medical history. If preferred, research co-ordinator Sasan Khah said the team will visit a patient or family member's home for the assessment.

The appointment takes one to two hours and participants will be interviewed about their medical history and give blood samples.

About 24 Toronto-area endocrinologists are referring patients to the study. The next phase will include participants from the Montreal area.

Boright said recruitment and initial clinical assessment will continue for another two years. Then, researchers will begin studying the genes.

"Once certain genes are identified, we will look more closely to see what sort of pathway the genes are on. This may lead to identification of other areas we haven't looked at before," he said.

The results may also lead to drug therapy.

"We can see where we can intervene therapeutically to control complications," Boright said. "Also, if we know someone is at higher risk, we can be quite aggressive with his diabetes."

Ashkenazi Jews do not have a higher incidence of Type 1 diabetes or associated complications, he said. But because they tend to marry within the group, they have fewer genetic variations, making them a desirable population for study.

"The population's genetic makeup is not as complex as the genetic makeup in other populations. Because the genetic structure is so uniform, it is easier to pick up genetic effects," he said.

"It is important to find these associations. Then we can start to look at other populations to see if it's important in other populations as well."

Boright said participants so far have been healthier compared to similar groups with Type I diabetes. He said this is probably because healthier people are more likely to volunteer. He is hoping to see some volunteers with more advanced complications.

So far, 65 patients, 50 parents and 29 siblings have participated in the study. Eleven per cent of the patients had severe eye disease, nine per cent had kidney complications, five per cent had nerve damage and seven per cent were affected by vascular disease.

Dr. Ron Goldenberg, an endocrinologist at North York General Hospital who has referred patients to the study, said diabetes is the leading cause of adult blindness, and diabetes leading to kidney failure is the No. 1 reason for dialysis in Canada.

"Some patients are ravaged by complications and others seem protected from complications even if they have had diabetes for many years," he said.

In his own practice, Goldenberg said he sees conditions that tend to run in families. "This suggests genetics plays a role."

If you want to take part in the study in Toronto or Montreal, call 416-340-4800, ext. 5612.

CJC angered Mohammad still in Canada

In a letter to a risk assessment officer one year ago that is also filed with the court, Jackman raised the concern that Mohammad might eventually be forcibly removed from Lebanon to Israel.

"He cannot be put in a position where he comes under the jurisdiction of Israeli authorities, because although already pardoned for the 1968 offence, he would face either further prosecution, contrary to the human rights principle of autre fois convict [already convicted of the offence], or summary execution. There is little doubt that Israel murders persons perceived to have wronged its people."

Jackman also suggests, without providing any evidence, that Israel was once suspected of intending to assassinate Mohammad on board an international passenger flight. She referred to a 1995 incident in which Mohammad agreed to leave Canada voluntarily and got as far as London before his RCMP escort determined the trip was dangerous and turned back.

"There was a fear not only that Mr. Mohammad might be attacked in air transit, but that others on the plane might be harmed as well. Mr. Mohammad is safe from attack here, as there is no history of such attacks in Canada, however this is not the case in other parts of the world where Israel and other forces have acted."

Documents filed in Federal Court show the PRRA case review officer found Mohammad "would not be subject to risk of torture, risk to life or risk of cruel and unusual treatment or punishment" should he be deported to Lebanon, where he once resided and which is his wife's place of birth.

Responding to Mohammad's challenge of the PRRA, government lawyers argued in Federal Court documents that there is no evidence for Mohammad's claims he would be persecuted or face torture in Lebanon. They noted he could access medical care at UN refugee camps or through private hospitals, but that at any rate, access to medical care is not determinative in ruling whether he is in need of protection.

In determining whether the risk of return to Lebanon outweighs the risk to Canadian society if he remains, government lawyers contended that given Mohammad's personal involvement in an act of terrorism, he "continued to pose a risk to Canadian society."

Eric Vernon, a spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "We find it outrageous that this man is still in Canada after all these years. He's had ample due process. We believe it's time for Canada to show it is not a haven for terrorists.

"In many ways, the system has facilitated the lengthy delays in this case. We think it's a shame that a man convicted of terror and murder should have been allowed to remain in Canada all these years."

Vernon suggested Mohammad's 1995 refugee claim was bogus. "The refugee system is for genuine refugees seeking asylum. It's not there to protect people who have been convicted of murder," he said.

An unfortunate way to drive home a point

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The bus bombing in Jerusalem one day before the International Court of Justice hearings on Israel's security fence tragically underscored Israel's case that the fence is a necessity – not a "land grab" as the Palestinians claim. And for once, much of the international media appears to be listening.

On Feb. 22, the BBC had a surprisingly good report from Jerusalem correspondent James Reynold. While covering both Palestinian and Israeli concerns, Reynold concluded: "Tonight both Israel and the Palestinians have sent campaigners to The Hague to fight for international opinion. The bombing in this city has reinforced arguments on each side, and it's a reminder that the fiercest fight about the barrier is being waged not in international courts but right here in this land."

On CTV's National News, Janis Mackey Frayer reported scenes of the devastation in Jerusalem. She cited Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Jonathan Peled: "We don't need more proof to show the world why we need a security fence."

She also interviewed Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia. As he was denouncing the barrier as a land-grab, Qureia was interrupted with news of the bombing. Removing his microphone, he said candidly, "It's a gift to The Hague."

When anchor Sandie Rinaldo later asked why Israel is boycotting the ICJ, Frayer replied: "Israel says there's no point or reason to defend itself before a court it feels doesn't have jurisdiction to hear such a case in the first place. A number of countries, Canada included, have submitted briefs stating pretty much the same opinion, though they back away from making any declaration on the fence itself."

Adrienne Arsenault, reporting for CBC News: Sunday Report (Feb. 22), graphically depicted the bus wreckage and human toll caused by the bombing. She featured Nir Barakat, the deputy mayor of Jerusalem seen with hands bloodied from efforts to help the wounded at the scene of the attack.

"Palestinians were counting on winning widespread support for the argument that the barrier is a land grab causing irreparable harm to their lives and their economy," said Arsenault. "It's hard to fathom how this [bombing] will help their cause now."

The following night, Arsenault reported from Abu Dis, just east of Jerusalem, where Palestinians were protesting the erection of the "wall." She described their anger and the hardships the barrier will undeniably cause Palestinians, including one family with children requiring medical treatment in Jerusalem.

She then interviewed Avi Ohayon whose ex-wife and two children were murdered in November 2002 when a Palestinian gunman burst into her home. Avi could only listen helplessly on his cellphone to her desperate pleas for help. Today, like most Israelis, he agrees that Palestinians may be inconvenienced by the fence, but that cannot compare with the need to save lives.

A similar point was made by Mark Heller in the piece "Unwanted, but necessary" (Globe and Mail, Feb. 23). "The barrier does impose serious hardship on Palestinians interested only in their personal welfare," wrote Heller. "Part of this stems simply from Israeli insensitivity, for which the Israeli government should be called to account. But much of it stems from an unavoidable tradeoff between Israeli life and Palestinian quality-of-life which, for most Israelis, is no choice at all. The only way to avoid such a tradeoff is for the Palestinians to abandon a political culture that glorifies martyrdom and incites people to murder."

Reflecting a similar position, in its editorial "The Intifada is stupid" (Feb. 24), the Globe wrote: "The security barrier that the Palestinians are decrying at The Hague is a direct result of the violence… Israel would not even have contemplated such an extreme measure unless it was under repeated attack."

During the trial at The Hague, most editorial and op-ed pieces across Canada agreed that Israel's security fence was regrettable but necessary. It is unfortunate that it took yet another act of terrorism for Israel's case to finally be understood.

Gay students reconnect with Judaism at conference

By RYAN KRAFT
Special to The CJN

National Union of Jewish Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender Intersex Queer Questioning Students meets in Washington

It was like coming home. I felt an instant connection to every person in the room. All around me were the people I wish I had known in high school, while I was struggling with my own identity. I was about to begin a weekend filled with learning, fun, and laughter. I was about to begin my weekend at the NUJLS conference.

Guest Voice

Last month, I attended the National Union of Jewish Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender Intersex Queer Questioning Students (NUJLS) conference in Washington, D.C., run under the auspices of Yad B'Yad, D.C.'s LGBTIQQ Jewish student group. For three days, more than 90 of us, including four Canadians, shared experiences, talked about issues important to us as queer Jewish students, and made plans for the future of the organization.

I ran into several people I had met at Jewish programs I attended in high school. I was the only Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) graduate there, but others have attended in previous years. A former United Synagogue Youth advisor reminded me of the time I told him that I thought I was the only gay person at an international convention.

On Friday night, I attended a session called "Why I Am Not At Services" moderated by Rabbi Toby Manewith, senior educator at George Washington University Hillel. Our discussion was one of the most positive experiences of the weekend. I was relieved to know that I was not the only one who felt uncomfortable in services, not only when reciting the prayers, but about the entire idea of praying to God. We discussed why we were not praying, as well as the blessings themselves, their histories, and how each of us prays – if at all.

Saturday afternoon, I attended a session about Israel's progressive legislation, dating back to 1988 when a ban on homosexual relations was abolished. In fact, Israel has become something of a haven for gay Palestinians. It was after this session that I began to be interested in Israel again. Although I had visited Israel with March of the Living, this conference was the first time I was able to make a real connection with Israel. I may even travel to Jerusalem for World Pride in August 2005.

Dr. Caryn Aviv and Gregg Drinkwater, co-founders and co-directors of Jewish Mosaic: The National Jewish Center for Sexual and Gender Diversity, led a session on combating homophobia in Jewish campus communities. We shared personal experiences and talked about what types of services were available for queer Jews on campus, what services should be available, and how to foster understanding and dialogue. We also brainstormed ways to put these ideas into action.

Unfortunately, only a very small percentage of universities have resources for queer Jews. It is my hope that a fellow delegate and I will be able to start a group for Jewish LGBTIQQ students at York University before the end of this year.

The conference was an awesome opportunity to meet people from across the continent and to talk about issues relating to us, the queer Jewish campus community. I was given the opportunity to learn about Israel in a new context, and I met both students and non-students who had shared experiences similar to those I'd had at school and with my family. I learned more about myself during those three days than I could ever have imagined.

I learned that being Jewish is something that really is important to me. It's more than a cultural skin – it's in my blood. I know now that I left certain parts of Judaism by the roadside because of pain and pestering that I experienced in Jewish day schools. I probably won't ever become a religious Jew, but my Judaism – along with my sexual identity – will continue to play a central role in my journey of self-discovery.

Currently in Toronto, there is only one group for queer Jewish students, called kulanu. They can be contacted at kulanu toronto@hotmail.com. Jewish Mosaic can be reached at info@jewishmosaic.org. NUJLS can be contacted through Nathan Weiner at nathan@nujls2004.org. Information on World Pride 2005 can be found at http://www.gay.org.il/joh/eng/WPJ.htm.

Singer named new Concordia provost

MONTREAL – Martin Singer, a history professor at Concordia University for more than 30 years, has been appointed provost for a five-year term beginning June. 1.

He replaces Jack Lightstone who is completing 10 years in the position.

As provost, Singer will be responsible for overseeing the administration of academic activities, including research, teaching and curriculum. The provost reports to rector Frederick Lowy and, after the rector, is the university's senior academic officer.

Currently dean of the arts and sciences faculty, Singer was the founding director of the Council for International Academic Cooperation from 1986 to 1989 and served as acting chair of the history department from 1994 until his appointment as dean.

Singer, who holds a PhD in history from the University of Michigan, became a professor at Concordia in 1972. He has published and lectured widely on Chinese history and contemporary Chinese-Canadian academic relations.

"[Singer's] understanding of the issues facing the university in the coming five years and his grasp of the importance and potential of the role of provost is most impressive," Lowy said. "I have every confidence that he will provide strong academic leadership and build on the tremendous legacy left by Jack Lightstone."

Lightstone, a scholar of early Judaism and former chair of the religion department, will return to teaching. He recently published the book Mishnah and the Social Formation of the Early Rabbinic Guild: A Socio-Rhetorical Approach.

Purim Food Ideas

New variations on traditional Purim treats

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

We began to be creative with hamantaschen when my son Ryan, now almost 21, was in senior kindergarten. It was his idea to tint the dough with food colouring – pink, green and blue. Since then, his tastes have become more sophisticated, and our family hamantaschen experiments now include a decadent chocolate filling, as well as a tasty walnut-honey mixture.

Traditionally, the triangular Purim pastries – shaped to resemble Haman's hat – are filled with a poppyseed or prune mixture.

This year, I tried a new recipe – a chocolate cookie-type dough with a peanut butter filling, from Marlene Sorosky's Fast & Festive Meals for the Jewish Holidays (HarperCollins Canada). I substituted soy milk for the regular milk in the recipe below. The results were excellent.

Rabbi Yossi Sapirman of Beth Torah Congregation said the popularity of new twists on the basic hamantaschen recipe are "quite symbolic [because] we maintain the structure but change the filling. It's like the Torah. No one has ever changed the Torah, but we interpret it differently."

To simplify matters, I sometimes buy prepared hamantaschen dough, available at some kosher bakeries. I also use parchment paper to line the baking sheets, to facilitate clean-up. And we've decided that the rims of our kitchen drinking glasses (2½ inches in diameter) are just the right size to cut hamantaschen dough in circles, with the resulting pastries small enough that we can sample a variety of them.

CHOCOLATE-PEANUT BUTTER HAMANTASCHEN

From Fast & Festive Meals for the Jewish Holidays, by Marlene Sorosky (HarperCollins Canada)

Chocolate Dough

6 tbsp. butter or margarine, at room temperature
1 cup powdered sugar
1 large egg
1 tsp. vanilla extract
2 oz. unsweetened chocolate, melted and cooled slightly
1½ cups all-purpose flour
½ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt

Peanut Butter Filling

Scant ¾ cup creamy peanut butter
½ cup strawberry jam or preserves
3 tbsp. whole or low-fat milk
strawberry jam for topping (optional)

Place rack in upper third of oven and preheat to 350. Grease or spray 2 heavy-duty or cushioned baking sheets (or use two pans together).

Dough: Using electric mixer, cream butter and sugar on medium-high speed until very light and fluffy, about 2 minutes. Mix in egg and vanilla until well blended. Mix in melted chocolate. Add flour, baking soda and salt, and mix on low until incorporated. Mix on medium speed 1 minute. Shape into a flat disk and wrap in plastic wrap. Refrigerate until cold enough to roll.

Filling: In a medium bowl, stir peanut butter and jam together. Stir in milk.

Divide dough in half; cover one portion with plastic wrap. Roll other half into an 11-inch circle, about ⅛ inch thick. Using a 3-inch round cutter (or a clean, empty tuna can), cut out circles. Spoon 1½ teaspoons filling into the centre of each circle. Press three edges together to make a triangle. Place 1 inch apart on prepared baking sheets. Reroll scraps, cut out and fill.

Bake 10 to 12 minutes, or until tops are firm. The cookies will firm up slightly as they cool. If you like them soft, bake the minimum time; for crisper cookies, bake longer.

If desired, top each with a small dollop of jam and return to oven for one minute to set.

Cool 2 minutes and remove to rack.

KRAFT FAMILY CHOCOLATE HAMANTASCHEN FILLING

1½ cups chocolate chips
⅓ cup chocolate syrup (e.g. Brown Cow)
½ tsp. cinnamon

Process chocolate chips in food processor about 30 seconds, until somewhat broken up. Add chocolate syrup and cinnamon and process another 15 seconds, or until mixed.

Use with your favourite recipe for hamantaschen dough.

Passion's harsh images can be dangerous

By RABBI ASHER JACOBSON

Guest Voice

Whether or not Mel Gibson is anti-Semitic is irrelevant. What concerns the Jewish community about his movie The Passion of Christ is the potentially dangerous impact it can have on Jews – and for good reason.

For centuries, portrayals and sermons of "The Passion," based on the Gospels, have incited virulent condemnation, animosity and violence toward Jews, with Christians lashing out to punish those they have learned to call "Christ-killers." This long-lived, venomous libel, which promulgates the notion of collective Jewish guilt, has in the past poisoned the minds of many and has been a source of immeasurable suffering for the Jewish people.

In 1934, after viewing the ignoble Passion Play in Oberammerga, Adolf Hitler declared that it "convincingly portrayed the menace of Jewry."

Some of the most horrific crimes in past centuries have been a result of Christian ideology. When Christians see a cross, they see a symbol of salvation, redemption and hope. When Jews see a cross, they see a symbol under which their relatives have been slaughtered for 2,000 years.

Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams has stated: "Some Christians at least have learned to reread their foundational story as one about ideological violence." It is this history that prompted Pope John Paul II to courageously and publicly pray for God's forgiveness of Christianity's past.

This doleful history demands special vigilance from both Jewish and Christian leadership – particularly today, when anti-Semitism is dangerously on the rise throughout the world – so that dogmatic and hateful positions are not reintroduced, thereby frustrating 40 years of resolutions, reconciliations and apologies that have advanced Jewish and Christian relations since the second Vatican Council's Nostra Aetate declaration on the relation of the Church to non-Christian religions.

Ironically, the Gospel stories on which Gibson's movie is based was written decades after the death of Jesus. It was not written in the Galilee or in Jerusalem, where Jesus lived and died. It was not written in Aramaic or Hebrew, the language which he spoke. Rather, it was written in Greek in the cities of Rome and Antioch, in an atmosphere of great hostility toward Judaism, where the early church sought to distance itself from its Jewish roots. This was in the aftermath of the Jewish-Roman War in 70 CE, when anti-Jewish resentment in Rome was especially strong. It was a time when it was fashionable to call Jews "Christ-killers." It is not surprising that this Gospel story has generated more anti-Semitism than all the other anti-Jewish writings ever written, and has led to the seven Crusades, the Inquisitions, Oberammergau and, ultimately, Auschwitz.

One must honestly question whether these Gospel accounts were composed within a context that was compromised and conditioned by the cultural, linguistic and religious setting from which they emanated.

Jesus was a Jew who practiced pharisaic (rabbinic) Judaism. Throughout his life, he preached only to his fellow Jews. His 12 disciples and Nazarene followers were Jews. Both his defenders and accusers were Jewish. They were not called "Christians" but "believers." If Jesus were to return today, he undoubtedly would be more at home attending a Chassidic synagogue in Outremont then at your local Baptist church.

It is precisely his inseparable attachment to the Jewish community that makes his rejection an irreconcilable, and unfortunately harmful, point of contention between Judaism and Christianity.

Judaism has a lot to say about this story. Unfortunately, the Talmud had to censor many parts of it throughout the generations for fear of persecution. It is high time that the church body consider listening to the Jewish version of a Jewish story.

Maimonides writes that many who profess belief in God have such a confused understanding they cannot rightly be considered believers. What they believe in is not God. They use the word "God" with application only to some lesser concept, which is all they comprehend. If a fundamentalist religious group fosters hate and bigotry in the name of their beliefs, then that group not only perverts the beauty of religion, but has lost touch with God.

To the loving Christian, this movie will be a brutal and hard experience to watch. To the anti-Semite, this exaggerated and harsh imagery of Jews is like placing a sword in the hands of your enemy.

Montreal group responds to film

MONTREAL – Christian-Jewish Dialogue in Montreal (CJDM) issued a statement saying that the movie "may foster misunderstandings between Christians and Jews and nourish anti-Semitism.

"Like all art works based on historical events, Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ may create the illusion that it faithfully reproduces the details of Jesus' Passion with its cruelty and violence. Viewers may be left with the impression that without the Jews these things never would have happened," said CJDM president Jean Duhaime, a University of Montreal theology professor and expert in early Christianity.

The statement calls on Christian leaders in Montreal to publicly affirm their churches' current teachings which reject the accusation of deicide and collective Jewish guilt for the death of Jesus.

The movie should be seen as "one perspective on the Passion," CJDM says, and urges the public to form their own opinions based on the Gospels themselves and the "insights of biblical scholars today."

Sharansky to open anti-Semitism conference

MONTREAL – Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky, the most famous Soviet-era prisoner of conscience, is scheduled to be the opening speaker at an international conference on anti-Semitism in Montreal March 14 to 16.

Sharansky, Israel's Minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora Affairs, heads a list of scholars and experts speaking at the conference, organized by the Quebec-Israel Committee in collaboration with the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research and Canadian Jewish Congress.

Among them are: Shmuel Trigano, founding director of the College of Jewish Studies at the Alliance Israelite Universelle; Khaleel Mohammed, an Islamic studies professor at San Diego State University and an expert on Jewish-Muslim relations; Harvard University professor Ruth Wisse; Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center; Anne Bayefsky, a York University professor and authority on international human rights law; authors James Carroll, Daniel Goldhagen, Deborah Lipstadt and Hillel Halkin; and Phyllis Chesler, a feminist psychologist who wrote The New Anti-Semitism (2003).

Quebec Premier Jean Charest has also been invited to speak at the opening, but was not confirmed at the time of writing.

The theme of the conference is "The Global Dimensions of Contemporary Anti-Semitism," and its goal is to better understand the upsurge in anti-Semitism over the past few years and how to fight it.

The conference is by invitation only, and guests will include intellectuals and community leaders, as well as what organizers call "decision-makers and informed observers." Several sessions will be open to the public.

"The resurgence of a new type of global anti-Semitism, which is often associated with anti-Israel sentiment and related to largely political considerations, is more and more evident. It's a trend that cannot be ignored, which begs to be studied," said Frederick Krantz, co-chair of the conference's organizing committee and a Concordia University history professor.

His co-chair Marc Gold, a McGill University law professor, added: "It is the sign of a dangerous downward spiral. This should not be a cause for alarmism, but rather a call for vigilance. To a large extent, anti-Semitism is an expression of intolerance and ignorance that threatens universal values such as dignity, democracy, pluralism and liberty. History teaches us that we must address these phenomena as soon as they surface, or risk seeing them spread and get out of control."

Conference proceedings will be filmed and distributed in video and DVD formats, accompanied by a monograph, in English and French.

Jewish student has audience with the Pope

MONTREAL – Loren Shore has a special keepsake: a limited edition Euro coin with a profile of Pope John Paul II commemorating the 25th anniversary of his pontificate.

It means a lot to Shore, not just because he is a collector, but because the Pope gave it to him personally.

This past January, Shore, 21, a Jewish Montrealer, met privately with Pope John Paul II in his Vatican quarters, where he spent more than an hour talking to him in English.

Shore says when he told the Pope he was studying business at McGill University, the pontiff wanted to give him an appropriate memento.

"He blessed me and wished me success as a businessman," said Shore.

Cotler feted by his Mount Royal constituents

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Justice Minister Irwin Cotler insists that the federal government is taking unprecedented measures to get to the bottom of the $100-million sponsorship scandal and to prevent anything like it from occurring again.

Prime Minister Paul Martin's decision to release cabinet documents, as well as all other relevant material, "has never happened in the history of this country," Cotler said at a buffet brunch in his honour held last week at the Gelber Conference Centre.

The privacy of cabinet documents is protected by the constitution, he said.

"Everyone in the cabinet has the same commitment to getting to the truth, is as outraged as the people in the country [over the scandal]," he said.

Cotler defended Martin's stated ignorance of what was going on while he was finance minister.

"If someone is stealing, are they going to tell you? Someone who would engage in this type of fraud will also want to cover it up," Cotler said.

Cotler was welcomed back to his home riding of Mount Royal like a conquering hero at his first major tribute since his appointment as justice minister and attorney-general in December.

About 500 people, including a cross-section of the area's ethnic groups, packed the centre to congratulate Cotler, who has been Mount Royal MP since 1999. Colourful leis were thrown around his neck as he entered the room.

Cotler assured guests that the adulation will not go to his head. When first elected with a massive majority, "My son said to me, 'Dad, if Donald Duck ran for the Liberals in this riding, he would get 90 per cent of the vote.' When you have a humbling presence like that at home, you don't need to worry."

A self-deprecating Cotler described how he was appointed. "One day before the swearing-in, I got a call from Paul Martin asking 'What do I do with a guy with weird ideas about human rights and justice?' And I said, 'I always thought human rights meant justice,' and he said, 'Congratulations, you're minister of justice.'"

Mark Leiter, president of the Mount Royal Liberal Association, which organized the event, said Cotler was the "obvious choice" for the job because of his lifelong championing of human rights.

FEDERATION CJA president Sylvain Abitbol said Cotler has followed former U.S. first lady Eleanor Roosevelt's dictum that universal human rights start at the level of individuals.

Bashir Hussein, president of the Alliance of South Asian Communities, said Cotler has "helped people and communities without any prejudices," citing the example of Maher Arar, who is of Arab origin, and mentioning Cotler's sensitivity to the problems of visible minorities, who make up 25 per cent of the riding.

Association vice-president Gwen Lord described Cotler as "an ordinary man who does extraordinary things. He is an important example that the average person, with commitment, can make a difference."

McGill University law professor Patrick Healy, a former student of Cotler's, said, "My esteem for Irwin's extraordinary talent is matched only by my affection for him as a good man."

Cotler, he suggested, was ahead of his time in envisioning Canada's transformation from a parliamentary to a constitutional democracy, and he always had a profound belief in the enshrinement of rights in law.

Through his life's work, Cotler has shown that the "theory and practice of law are indivisible"

"For over 30 years, he worked tirelessly and frequently to the point of exhaustion and danger to show the law can secure freedom and dignity for persons unknown to us and those known to all of us," Healy said.

In his current role as the Crown's chief lawyer and steward of the government's justice policy, Cotler has a "heavy burden," but he is more up to the task than some of his predecessors, who did not "always have sufficient intelligence or personal strength," Healy said.

Quebec Revenue Minister Lawrence Bergman, a friend since childhood, believes Cotler was deeply influenced by the lessons they learned from the prophets about doing justice and walking humbly.

"He is a scholar who has taken his knowledge into the world of action and put it to good use," Bergman said.

Cotler's predecessor as Mount Royal MP, retired senator Sheila Finestone, said power hasn't changed him. "Everyone still feels he's Irwin, not the minister."

Cotler could have been content with a "stellar" career as a law professor, but instead worked for the defence of both the famous and the anonymous oppressed around the world, Finestone said.

"It's telling that his first words after being sworn in were 'Justice, justice shall you pursue'," she said.

Israel may need Egypt's help to leave Gaza

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

After Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon announced he was planning to withdraw unilaterally from the Gaza Strip, several weeks passed before Israeli officials realized they were neglecting an important detail: Egypt, Gaza's other neighbour.

Israeli officials are apparently starting to realize that before making major changes at home, it pays to consult your neighbours.

The southwestern corner of the Gaza Strip borders Egypt's Sinai Desert. Israeli forces are deployed along that 12-mile corridor, called the "Philadelphia Axis" in military slang. Israel retained control of the corridor after the Palestinian Authority took over Gaza in 1994.

A withdrawal from Gaza would mean giving up that control, which could mean trouble for Israel. Time and again, Palestinians have dug tunnels under this border area, which is several hundred yards wide at points, to smuggle arms into Gaza from Egypt. Those arms include rockets with the capability of reaching Israeli towns and cities.

Periodically, the Israeli army pushes into the southern Gaza town of Rafah to destroy the tunnels, which appear to run largely unimpeded on the Egyptian side.

If this is the case when the Israel Defence Forces retains ultimate control over the area, one can only imagine the scope of arms-smuggling operations into Gaza once the soldiers leave that line. Sharon has indicated that he intends to have Israeli soldiers leave "Philadelphia" as part of the overall pullout from Gaza, but it's now clear that can't happen without full Egyptian co-operation.

When the United States was pressing Israel to withdraw from Palestinian-populated Gaza in co-operation with the Palestinians and the Egyptians, Israel said the Palestinians didn't want to co-operate.

However, Israel had no problem with the idea of co-ordinating the withdrawal with the Egyptians. Negotiations between Israel and Egypt have already begun. Meir Dagan, head of the Mossad security agency, visited Egypt recently for discussions on the matter.

While Egypt endorses an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, it is concerned about the repercussions. In an interview with an Egyptian media agency last week, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak recalled that his predecessor, the late Anwar Sadat, rejected taking over Gaza back in 1978 during Egypt's talks with former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin.

Mubarak said proposals that Israel transfer control of the strip to Egypt – as Israeli cabinet minister Effi Eitam, leader of the National Religious Party, has proposed – are simply "not serious."

The Egyptians are truly concerned. They are well aware of the possible complications of close contact with the 1.3 million Palestinians on their northern border.

If Hamas takes over Gaza after an Israeli pullout, Egypt is worried it would boost the radical Islamic fundamentalist movement inside Egypt itself. After years of unrest among Egypt's Islamic fundamentalists, Mubarak's government only recently succeeded in curbing these elements.

Aside from Egyptian reticence, there are other problems with an Egyptian takeover of security responsibility along the Gaza border.

According to the terms of Egypt's peace treaty with Israel, both countries can only deploy limited forces along the border. A treaty amendment would be required for Egypt to take control of the border. That will be one of the issues on the agenda during Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz's trip to Egypt next month.

After meeting Mubarak last week in Cairo as the head of a Labor Party delegation, party leader Shimon Peres said Egypt would eventually take over responsibility for the border.

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, a former Israeli defence minister, said afterward that the Egyptians assured the Israeli delegation they would ban arms-smuggling into Gaza. However, they have yet to do so.

Also, in exchange for Egypt's co-operation, Israel would have to pledge that the Gaza withdrawal would be the first step of a larger pullout from West Bank areas, coordinated not only with Egypt but the Palestinian Authority as well.

But co-ordination these days between Israel and the Palestinian Authority is problematic, to say the least. Although PA President Yasser Arafat initially rejected Sharon's Gaza pullout plan, the Palestinians are now saying they should be partners in the withdrawal.

Jibril Rajoub, Arafat's national security adviser, recently dismissed concerns that Hamas would take over Gaza once Israel left.

"We will fight them and prevent them," Rajoub told Israeli military reporters in his Ramallah office last week. "Hamas will not be able to control Gaza," he said, noting, "Palestinians want a secular and democratic system of governance, not a fundamentalist one."

But can the Palestinian Authority really take control of Gaza? Judging by the internal crisis in Fatah, Arafat's ruling party, the extent of the Palestinian Authority's control over anything in the Palestinian areas is highly dubious.

Over the weekend, Fatah ended a contentious four-day debate on reform by calling for a cease-fire with Israel – this just days after Fatah's armed faction, the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade terror group, perpetrated a bus bombing in Jerusalem that killed eight people.

Some PA officials called for the dismantling of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, but Arafat's security adviser told reporters the issue never reached the agenda in the Ramallah meetings of the Fatah Revolutionary Council.

The meetings were called by Fatah's young guard in part to protest the party's failure to hold new elections for the Fatah Central Committee. The 16-member body, which is widely believed to wield the real power in the Palestinian Authority, was elected in 1989.

This is the first time in three years the council – which is supposed to meet every three months – has met.

Earlier in the meetings, Arafat reportedly hurled a microphone at Fatah official Nasser Yousef for suggesting PA security forces are inefficient. Yousef, whom Arafat called a traitor, threw a pen at Arafat.

The growing internal criticism of Arafat and his entourage is a sign the PA leader is losing his grip on the the West Bank, not to mention Gaza. Critics are also complaining about the lack of a clear political vision and strategy for dealing with Israel.

Over the weekend, Nablus Mayor Ghassan Shaqa said he was resigning to protest the PA's failure to bring order to his increasingly lawless West Bank city.

"Our society is destroyed," Shaqa said, "and the Israeli occupation is not solely responsible for this."

Bus security system tested

The Egged bus company field-tested a system meant to spot suicide bombers before they board. Five buses with the driver-controlled entry turnstile were deployed in Jerusalem last week. One Egged staffer noted that a locked-out terrorist could still detonate and kill the driver.

Jordanian spy charged

A Jordanian was charged with spying for Israel. Khaled Mohammed Salim Al-Hayajneh allegedly confessed to charges he provided details on airports, military camps and Palestinian refugee camps in Jordan. His trial began last week. He was arrested in October, but case details were only made public recently.

Banks raided, funds seized

Police, Shin Bet officers, border police and army troops confiscated $8 million (US) from three banks in Ramallah last week on grounds the money came from accounts that were funnelling overseas funds to terror groups.

Wrong body to Hezbollah?

The Kul Al-Arab newspaper reported that a Lebanese family expecting to receive the body of a drug dealer who died in an Israeli jail instead received the body of a Jew in the recent exchange of more than 400 Arab prisoners for one live Israeli and three dead soldiers. Hezbollah now wants 30 more bodies as compensation. The Israeli army said the case is under review, but that it had not heard of any new demands from Hezbollah.

Maxim closed over security

The Haifa restaurant Maxim, the site of a suicide bombing in October that killed 21 people, was closed for 30 days by police due to inadequate security. A female undercover officer managed to enter wearing a mock suicide belt.

Passionate appeal to Pope

Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi Yona Metzger has urged the Pope to declare that Jews are not to blame for Jesus' death, fearing that Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ could revive such beliefs. Rabbi Metzger said he is sending a letter asking Pope John Paul II to reiterate a church decision from the 1960s that reversed the centuries-old doctrine blaming Jews for the crucifixion.

Israel ratifies Kyoto

Israel has ratified the Kyoto Protocol on climate change, which requires countries to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by eight per cent of 1990 levels between 2008 and 2012. Others that have ratified include Canada, Japan, Germany, Italy, India and Britain.

George Costanza talks peace

Actor Jason Alexander, who played George Costanza on the TV show Seinfeld, was in Israel last week to promote the One Voice peace initiative. Alexander said the One Voice plan would help end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In a news conference in Petach Tikvah, he predicted he would be able to bring his children to Jerusalem and Ramallah without fear within a year.

Analysis

A direct line connects the 2001 United Nations World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, to the deliberations about Israel's security barrier by the International Court of Justice in The Hague last week. It is part of the new Palestinian/Arab strategy: to portray Israel as the latest version of the apartheid regime in South Africa, to isolate and boycott it.

This is why the Arabs took advantage of the fact the UN conference took place in Durban, why they included a South African representative in the parade of witnesses against Israel in the The Hague.

In the face of this strategy, which is increasingly taking over western public discourse as well, Israel makes do with defensive manoeuvres. It tries to draft jurists and spokespeople to prove the difference between the Israeli presence in the disputed territories and the character of the South African apartheid regime. It emphasizes the principle of self-defence inherent in the security barrier. And when it does attack Palestinian terror, it does so only as a response to Palestinian claims, and then only in arenas into which it is dragged by the Palestinians.

Due to a (justifiable) lack of faith in the character of international institutions and in any chance the Israeli position might have in them, Israel has avoided bringing up its own proposals for condemning Palestinian terror. The concern is that the act itself will bestow Israeli legitimization on those institutions when they adopt anti-Israel stances.

Just a few months ago, Israel dared, for the first time in 28 years, to submit a proposal of its own to a UN human rights commission about the right of Israeli children to live free of terror. The result was predictable: Israel was forced to withdraw the resolution after Arab countries (led by Egypt) made so many changes to it that it was rendered meaningless.

But in the face of the systematic effort by the Palestinians and the Arab and Muslim world to put Israel in the international docket, defensive manoeuvres are no longer enough. An active Israeli initiative must hit anti-Israel political activity in its softest underbelly: the absurd situation whereby, time and again, an automatic majority of countries, with no semblance of protecting human rights, is able to place Israel at the top of the list of countries violating human rights.

Israel must lead a drive to demand that only democratic nations with a credible record of protecting human rights be members of the international community's human rights institutions. These include the International Court of Justice in The Hague, among whose judges for the fence hearing are representatives of countries known for their "enlightened" human rights policies, such as China (which supplied the chairperson for the panel) and Egypt.

The leaders of the Israeli initiative must arm themselves with patience and non-Jewish western supporters. At first it will be met with disbelief, if not with harsh criticism. But experience shows that a consistent, logical position can help, even if it seems hopeless.

Most importantly, even if this position is not actually adopted, the campaign around it will raise the public and moral status of the decisions taken by those international humanitarian bodies. Just as one of the great advantages of the Israel Defence Forces' anti-terror offensives is that the terrorists are forced to defend themselves, it is reasonable to assume that mounting an offensive against the image of these institutions, especially if it does not come only from Israelis, will force them to devote at least some of their energies to apologizing for including non-democratic countries. It will also force them to consider with greater care the issues they take up and the decisions they make.

Seizing the initiative at The Hague

By MARC GOLD
Special to The CJN

Comment

Something very important happened last week, and I had the good fortune to participate in what could potentially represent a new and exciting direction for Israel advocacy.

For months now, Israel and Jewish communities around the world have been trying to develop an effective approach to deal with the International Court of Justice's (ICJ) consideration of the Israeli security barrier. During the course of those deliberations – which mirrored sessions of an ad hoc committee we established here in Canada – the mood was mainly grim. Would the experience at The Hague duplicate the anti-Israel feeding frenzy that characterized the infamous 2001 World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa? Would media attention turn the proceedings into a trial of Israel and ignore the root cause of the suffering in the region – the unremitting wave of terror and violence that has cost almost 1,000 Israeli lives and six times that number of casualties in the last three years alone?

As I travelled to The Hague to join an international delegation of Jewish leaders, Jewish Agency officials and representatives of the Israeli foreign Ministry, I didn't know what to expect. When I flew back to Canada five days later, the import of the experience began to crystallize in my mind.

In the lead-up to the ICJ hearing, I think supporters of Israel underwent their own kind of an "epiphany." Discussions began to take on a determined tone, their purpose being to re-take the publicity initiative captured so deftly by the Palestinians and their supporters over the past three years. Israel and world Jewry might have lost "the street" in Durban, but we were unwilling to cede the initiative to the Palestinians in The Hague.

If the reason that brought all of us to The Hague was distressing, the conduct of the pro-Israel forces was nothing short of inspirational. Tactically, each to his or her own target group "back home," we communicated a series of tightly constructed messages that emphasized the human impact of terrorism, sensitivity for those affected by the fence and the need for a co-ordinated international strategy to confront, condemn and outlaw suicide terrorism, which has become universal in its scope.

Positive and constructive tone hit a responsive chord

The pro-Israel demonstrations and media conferences were dignified and consistently "on message." The language of blame and recrimination against the Palestinians was discarded in favour of expressions of concern about the ICJ's credibility being threatened by its inappropriate intrusion into a purely political matter. In my new role as chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, I found the disciplined message to be an example of, and consistent with, the strategic direction being pursued by the CIC. More importantly, the strategy worked.

The messages were straightforward and understandable. Coupled with images that resonate with every Canadian (or American, Dane or Briton), the new hasbarah strategy was effective without being shrill, moving without being exploitative.

Take, for instance, the testimony of Rachel Koren, who lost her husband and two teenage sons in the March 2002 suicide bombing of Haifa's Matza restaurant. Though she had every reason to feel bitterness toward the terrorist and the planner of the attack that destroyed her family, Rachel said, "I have no hate in my heart, no desire for revenge. All I want, what all Israelis want, is to be left alone to live in peace." When she disclosed that she had agreed to donate one of her late husband's organs to a Palestinian mother of five, Rachel's were the only dry eyes in the packed conference room.

Irrespective of the outcome of the ICJ's deliberations inside the Peace Palace, the positive and constructive tone of the messages communicated on the streets of The Hague hit a responsive chord.

The reporting by Canadian media from The Hague was generally balanced. The Globe and Mail, CBC-TV, Radio Canada and the Toronto Star all provided fair coverage that included appropriate focus on the human cost of terrorism being borne by Israelis. Op-ed pieces across the country raised the right questions about the ICJ reference and the causal relationship between the fence and the terror that necessitated its construction. Even La Liberation, a hard-line French communist newspaper, referred to pro-Israel themes in an interview with me.

The hasbarah effort culminated in a unanimous statement calling on the European Union, other democratic states and ultimately the United Nations itself to adopt resolutions condemning and outlawing suicide terrorism as a crime that denies its victims the most basic of human rights – the right to life.

Back home, we know that these messages ring true for Canadians. The CIC is encouraging Canada to apply its considerable moral weight to initiatives within international agencies to adopt meaningful anti-suicide terror resolutions. That should begin with an effort here for Parliament to adopt an all-party consensus denouncing suicide terror.

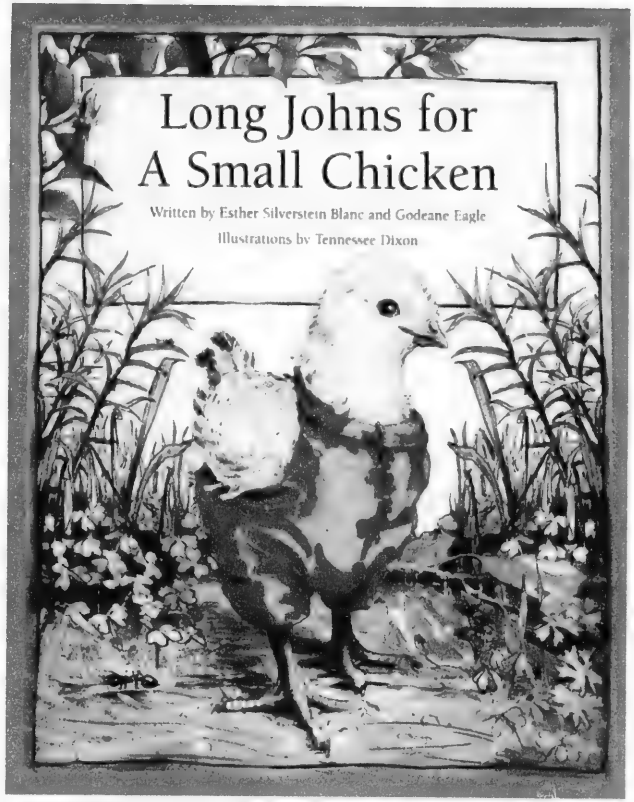
Books portray the mitzvah of kindness to animals

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



Long Johns for A Small Chicken
Written by Esther Silverstein Blanc and Godeane Eagle
Illustrations by Tennessee Dixon

Tsar baalei chayim, kindness to animals, is one of the rules Jews are supposed to follow.

That's why Mama knew that she had to care for an injured baby chicken in Long Johns for a Small Chicken, by Esther Silverstein Blanc and Godeane Eagle, with illustrations by Tennessee Dixon (Volcano Press, 2003).

That, and the fact that she was a very sweet and compassionate woman!

The family lived in a town in western Nebraska, which is in the north-central part of the United States. Nebraska isn't known as being home to many Jewish families, but there were some.

Although the family lived in a town where their father was a tailor, they had a garden where they grew vegetables to eat, and they raised chickens.

Mama knew that a storm was coming. "The birds are quiet, the sky has a brassy look and the air feels heavy," she said.

It was a terrible storm. "The wind began to blow and the cottonwood trees at the bottom of the garden whipped in wild motion."

Mama was watching the storm when she saw that one of the chicks got caught in the fence and was hanging from the wire by its wing tip.

She grabbed the wooden board she used to make noodles on, covered her head and rushed to rescue the chick.

The chick was cold and scared, but even worse was that his feathers had all been blown away by the storm.

The children and Mama warmed him up with heated towels until he began to chirp and could stand up on his own. Then she realized that he needed "something to keep him warm and to protect him until his feathers grow in."

> The chick was cold and scared, but even worse was that his feathers had all been blown away by the storm.

At that time (and even now, in places where it is very cold), men wore long johns, underwear that covered most of their body. Mama took an old pair of Papa's and fashioned long johns for the chick.

She was very smart about it. "His feet and legs were free, as were his wing tips, where a few feathers still grew. His long johns were open at the bottom so that Heltzel [that's what the family called him – it means neck in Yiddish] could go to the toilet without soiling his new clothes."

Heltzel stayed in a basket in the kitchen for several days until he got a bit stronger. Mama realized that he had to go back to the chicken coop as soon as he could. "If he becomes a stranger, the other chickens will peck him."

Well, he did go back. He grew and grew into a large rooster and became chief of the yard.

Silverstein Blanc also wrote another book about the family's days in Nebraska called Berchick. When the family lived on a farm, instead of in the town, Mama found a colt, a baby horse, whose mother had died giving birth to him.

Mama took the colt home, fed him from a bottle and made a little coat for him out of a blanket. They named him Berchick, and he became a pet. He began to follow the family around, especially Mama.

But times were very hard on the prairie, and Papa had to sell the farm, and everything on it, and move into town. Even Berchick had to be sold, which upset everyone very much, especially Mama.

It may sound as if this is a very sad story, but it isn't. Berchick escaped from the person who bought him and joined a group of horses that roamed around the country.

Both Long Johns for a Small Chicken and Berchick show what life was like in the early part of the 20th century. They are also a wonderful tribute to a kind and loving mother.

The books are available from bookstores, or from Volcano Press, P.O. Box 270, Volcano, California. 95689-0270.

JAMBEAU

Do you think you know the whole story of Purim? Maybe not... this story is based on the Midrash.

"General Mordechai, the General Haman would like to speak with you."

"Hmm..." said Mordechai. "Send him in."

A year earlier, Mordechai and Haman has been dispatched by King Achashverosh to squelch a rebellion in India. Each of them had been given 6,000 troops, and a three-year supply of food. Mordechai had attacked the rebel city from the east, Haman from the west. The attack was repelled, and a siege ensued. Now, it was only a matter of time.

Haman entered Mordechai's tent, glaring angrily. That didn't surprise Mordechai. After all, Mordechai was Jewish, and Haman didn't like Jews. In fact, he detested them. It was Haman who had helped stop the Jews from rebuilding their Temple in Jerusalem. No, his glare wasn't at all unusual. What was surprising was that Haman seemed to be making a concerted effort to suppress his glare and act as friendly as possible.

"Mordechai," began Haman, "my men are tired of waiting here in the scorching sun. Let's attack the city and go home."

"Haman, that's rather dangerous. If we attack now, we stand to lose many men. Let's just continue the siege. Sooner or later, they'll crack. We have enough provisions to wait it out, don't we?'

"Well, uh, not exactly. You see, we weren't really paying all that close attention to rationing, and we held, uh, occasional parties in honour of the king, and, you see, we're basically out of food."

"Oh."

"If we attack the city now, it wouldn't make much difference, but if you insist that we stay here, it would only be fair that you, uh, help us out a little bit."

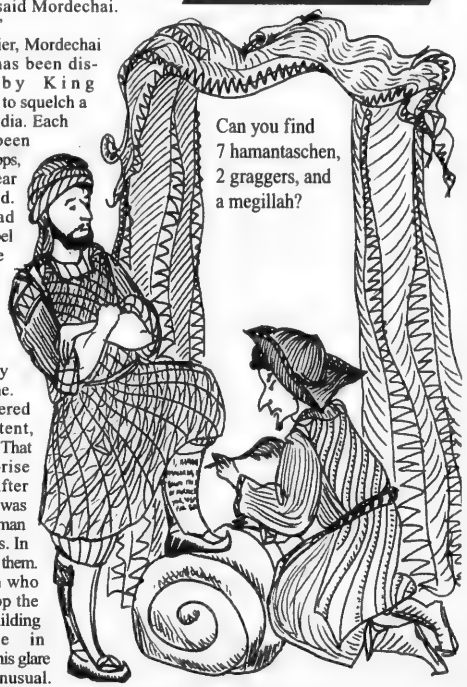
"I'm sorry, Haman, but you know that the king gave us exactly what he felt we needed. If I give you some of our supplies, my men will have to suffer. And I don't see why they should have to do so because of your carelessness."

"I'll pay you after we get back! I'll pay you back double!"

"I'm sorry, Haman, but I can't jeopardize the troops under my command."

Haman furiously stormed out, got on his horse, and galloped off toward his troops.

HIDDEN PIX



Mordechai thought to himself. Haman was dangerous. And Mordechai knew that Haman dreamed of power. It was frightening to think of what Haman might do to the Jews should his dreams ever be realized. This was Mordechai's chance to stop him. Mordechai smiled. Haman would be back.

Three days later, Haman staggered back into Mordechai's tent, his face scratched and bruised. "They almost killed me!" he burst out. "I barely escaped! My men are desperate for food. Please, have mercy! I'll pay you back 10 times the price! I'll do anything!"

"Anything?"

"Anything!"

"Oh, well in that case, I will gladly give you food...if you agree to become my personal servant."

Haman looked stricken. He paced and gnashed his teeth, but there was nothing he could do. He had to agree. "Fine," he finally spat.

"Very well then," said Mordechai. Let's draw up an official document. He turned to one of his assistants. "Shagshai, please get some parchment, and a quill."

"Sir, I can get a quill, but we don't have any parchment here."

"Oh...Well, we could write it on...no that won't work...how about..." Mordechai's gaze fell on his jambeau – his armoured foot-cover. "Perfect!" he exclaimed. Mordechai thought for a moment before writing: "I, Haman, son of Hamedassa, hereby become the servant of Mordechai, son of Yair, in exchange for bread."

He extended the jambeau to Haman to sign.

"Now that you are under my command, that places me in charge of your men as well. Therefore, I shall supervise the distribution of the food you have bought. That way, we won't end up back where we started."

Under Mordechai, the army united and morale soared. Three months later, the rebels surrendered, and Mordechai triumphantly returned to Shushan. Haman's return wasn't as triumphant. His only consolation was that Mordechai generously demanded his services only one day a week.

But Mordechai's plan failed to keep Haman from power, and one day, Haman emerged from the palace as the new prime minister, who would never have to work as a servant again. Hah! Now, everyone who saw him had to bow down to him, by royal decree.

But as the people of Shushan bowed to the ground before Haman, one man stood tall. Mordechai, in his flowing silk robes and iron jambeaux. Haman was the only one who understood this unusual choice of dress, but then again, he was the only one who had to.

Mordechai would bow to God alone. Not to any man. Not even to the prime minister. Especially if the prime minister was supposed to sweep your house every Friday afternoon.

Haman swelled with fury. And he set out to eradicate Mordechai and his nation.

You may already know the rest of the story: it's the Book of Esther, and you can hear it at your local synagogue on Purim.

Slick, subtly humorous narrative unique to Ravvin

Montreal-based writer dubbed 'eccentric, imaginative, and darkly funny.'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

In Lola By Night, a second novel from Montreal-based author Norman Ravvin, the heroine, Lola, is a young bestselling romance novelist from Barcelona who sets off on a quest to learn more about her late father and his connection to a decades-old murder.

Lola's existential journey takes her to Vancouver and New York, where she consorts with former associates of her father and other oddball characters.

Lola is a tough character to pin down. In Spain, she's a hugely successful but guardedly pseudonymous writer of potboilers who bolts from her burgeoning celebrity. In North America, she's a happy cipher-cum-sleuth who tries to resolve the questions about her father that have persistently nagged her.

Wherever she goes, she seems a happy-go-lucky, minimalistic figure who is as much of a mystery as the one she is trying to solve.

"She's one of those people who keep moving and keep changing," Ravvin says.

The book recounts her experiences in a slick, quirky, subtly humorous narrative, the style of which seems as unique to Ravvin as a fingerprint. He is, after all, a writer whom the New York-based Forward dubbed "eccentric, imaginative, and darkly funny" after his short story collection Sex, Skyscrapers, and Standard Yiddish appeared in 1997.

A second intriguing personality in the novel is Herman Rossman, a Jewish beat poet who is a comical throwback to the 1940s. According to Ravvin, Rossman was meant as a sort of surrogate role model for Canadian Jewish writers.

"He's a kind of imaginary forebear," he says. "He's the kind of writer they had in the United States but that we didn't have here. He's a marginal street poet – actually, more like a cross between the beats and the Yiddish poets that came before."

Like Lola, who brings a European sensibility to her perception of North America, Rossman seems to inhabit two worlds. Ravvin characterizes him as a "straddling figure" balanced between 1940s Yiddish culture and contemporary Canadian culture.

"He's a kind of person who's got his feet in both worlds – in that way, he sort of mirrors myself. It's another way of thinking of being a Jewish writer in Canada."

Ravvin is at least as peripatetic as his title character. Born in Calgary in 1963, he holds a PhD from the University of Toronto and is the current chair of the Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies at Concordia University in Montreal. He's also lived in Vancouver, taught creative writing in Fredericton and seen enough of the rest of the country to have written a travel book Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue (Red Deer Press, 2001).

Like his fictional creation Rossman and many genuine Jewish scribes, Ravvin sees himself as straddling a chasm between two worlds – a chasm widened, perhaps, by his strong Old World orientation. His father came from the region south of Moscow, his mother from the region north of Warsaw. Both came to Canada as children with their families in the decades before World War II. Insisting he be educated in Yiddish, they sent him to Calgary's now-defunct Peretz Yiddish Day School, from which he was among the last group of students to graduate.

Norman Ravvin

Ravvin's Yiddish background "has made a huge difference" in his life, he says. "It ended up becoming an ongoing interest for me and a resource for my writing because I became interested in Yiddish literature, which a person of my age normally wouldn't have access to. I'm sort of an oddball in that way."

Ravvin, who teaches a course at Concordia called "Ethics, Politics and the Canadian Jewish Community," recently delivered a paper about the early Yiddish version of Elie Wiesel's Holocaust novel Night and how it was altered in subsequent French and English translations.

"If I were a rich, rich man, I'd do a lot more of that than other things I do, because I enjoy that a lot."

His first novel, Café des Westens (1991), focuses on a Jewish family in Calgary and was "a more conventional effort to try to convey the role of Jewish history in a family." A book of essays about literature and the Holocaust – A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory – was published in 1997, as was the short story collection Sex, Skyscrapers, and Standard Yiddish (paperplates books), which stands among his most amusing, inventive and quirky literary accomplishments.

The prolific scholar-writer has also edited at least two notable books of Jewish interest: Not Quite Mainstream: Canadian Jewish Short Stories (2001) and Mordecai & Me: An Appreciation of A Kind, by Joel Yanofsky (2003).

The latter is the first in a projected series to be co-produced by Concordia's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies and Calgary's Red Deer Press. Ravvin and historian Richard Menkis are currently co-editing another volume in the series, The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader, which will offer "a real interdisciplinary approach to contemporary Jewish culture." Future titles will include fiction, non-fiction, popular history and memoirs.

Author straddles a chasm between two worlds

Ravvin is also in the midst of writing a second collection of stories, many focusing on the relationship between a father and young son. He is the father of a 3½-year-old boy.

"I'm using these stories as a way to try to capture him," he says. "It's a project I'm enjoying very much."

Lola By Night is published by paperplates books and sells for $19.95.

Artist is like no other; he is himself, 'I – Pichhadze'

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Artist Jacob Pichhadze asserts with absolute conviction that the people of his native Georgia, formerly within the Soviet Union, are the least anti-Semitic in the world.

This, he says, dates back 2,600 years to the time when the ruler of ancient Babylon, intent on expanding his realm, ousted the inhabitants of Judea and transported them to the region which is now Georgia.

The newcomers were warmly welcomed by the locals and allowed to observe their religion, Judaism. They quickly adapted to their recently acquired home and the two cultures lived side by side in harmony.

In later years, the Byzantine Christians invaded the territory and the majority of the original settlers plus some Jews, converted to Christianity either by choice or through fear. But there were some Jews who did not convert.

Fast forward to the 20th century when Pichhadze, who has been a student at the Tbilisi State Academy of Fine Arts, is successfully pursuing a career in oil and pastel painting.

Pichhadze however, feels frustrated. While the technical training at Tbilisi is superb, government control restricts the range of expression. Reaching out, exploring, is discouraged, nor is Jewish content advisable.

Although he cares deeply for the people of this land, it is time to leave. Something in the core of his being keeps repeating the words so often heard in his home and in the synagogue, "Next year in Jerusalem." In 1972 he and his wife Zina, set out for Israel.

"The first thing that strikes me as an artist," he says, "is the light, the blue, blue sky and the sunshine. Then I see the youth and the enthusiasm, the pride of country. Above all, there are the women soldiers who have an air which I have never encountered before."

His spirits soar. In Georgia he had been commissioned by the Christian church to paint icons — holy personages, saints, angels, but here in Israel he reasons, "Why not Jewish icons — Old Testament images."

He uses both oils and pastels, increasingly delving into the pastels, experimenting with colour, form, visibility. Before immigrating to Israel he was one of the originators of Georgian pastel art. Previously, in the mid-19th century, connoisseurs could only view pastel works in museums, admired as something beautiful but dismissed as being of minor importance.

Shira

Endeavouring to gain recognition in Israel, he presents exhibitions throughout the country, earning acclaim from discerning art critics, religious and political leaders.

Zina gives birth to their sons, Aviv and Amir.

After 16 years in Israel, Pichhadze wants the challenge of the Western World. In 1988 he brings his family to Toronto. Igor Kuchinski, owner of the former Heritage Gallery on Yorkville Ave. introduces him to the Toronto scene. He paints in his studio at home, and during the past decade has created a collection that he will show for the first time at Yazi Gallery which he and Zina are opening at 88 Scollard St. in Yorkville.

These 10 years have been particularly exploratory. Pichhadze does not work with pastel crayons out of a box. Employing a secret method, he devises his own pastel paints.

Traditional paintings are in his visual vocabulary but he is always traversing new paths, investigating colours and hues from subtle to arresting, moving from classical to surreal to abstract. His portraits of women encompass gentleness, strength, endurance, understanding, looking out from a countenance which reveals beauty of skin tone enhanced by flowing, velvet textured head scarf and robe.

Pichhadze is like no other artist. He is not Chagall, not Picasso; he is himself, I — Pichhadze and he is determined to become known across the continents as just that. Pichhadze's work is on display at Yazi Gallery from March 6 to 31. Call 416-961-5800.

The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz is still a great film 30 years later

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Thirty years on, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz is as fresh and sassy as it was in 1974.

Ted Kotcheff's two-hour film, based on Mordecai Richler's richly acerbic novel about a young, fiendishly ambitious Jewish hustler in 1940s Montreal, has been given a new lease on life by the Toronto International Film Festival Group.

Duddy will be re-released in Toronto on March 12 for a six-day run at the Carlton Cinema, in Winnipeg on March 6 at the Cinematheque Theatre and in Vancouver on March 25 at the Pacific Cinematheque. It was screened in Montreal at the Cinema du Parc from Feb. 28 to March 4.

Filmed in Montreal and Ste. Agathe, a Laurentian mountain resort favoured by Montreal Jews, Duddy will neither disappoint those who saw it three decades ago nor viewers watching it for the first time.

One of Canada's first international box office hits, the movie is smart and funny and generally unfolds at a frenetic pace. And its ability to recreate a bygone world, with all its myriad details, is quite impressive.

The cast is headed by Richard Dreyfuss as Duddy, Jack Warden as his father Max and Micheline Lanctot as Duddy's sweet French Canadian girlfriend Yvette. They are all first-rate.

The supporting performances, ranging from Joe Silver's turn as a gritty scrap dealer named Farber to Denholm Elliott's portrayal of a snotty British director making a very unusual bar mitzvah picture, are uniformly superb.

From its opening moments, Duddy succeeds in transporting us back to an era Richler so deftly distilled in his sharply observed, uproarious novel.

Panning on a parade of self-conscious army cadets marching through the streets of a Jewish neighbourhood, the camera swoops down on a vintage red Steinberg's delivery truck, a Guaranteed Milk delivery van and, of course, Moe Wilensky's legendary delicatessen. These touches quickly establish the film's authenticity.

Duddy Kravitz, an antsy cadet, immediately makes his presence felt when he blows up a condom and mischievously lets it loose. Then, sneaking out of formation, he dashes into Wilensky's, where Max, as usual, is holding forth on a variety of topics.

A widower, Max is a talkative taxi driver who has been known to pimp for prostitutes. As Max, Warden is letter perfect, the epitome of a working-class stiff trying to bring up two sons.

Max's older son, Lennie (Allan Rosenthal), the apple of his eye and Duddy's polar opposite, is a stolid McGill University medical student whose studies are financed by Uncle Benjy (Joseph Wiseman), the proprietor of a garment factory.

Benjy, a serious man with a distinct European manner, dislikes Duddy, whom he contemptuously describes as "a little Jew-boy on the make." Indeed, Duddy is a Canadian Sammy Glick, an upwardly mobile overachiever.

Virtually the only person who appreciates Duddy's raw qualities is his rabbinical-looking grandfather, a pious shoemaker whose credo is summed up in one telling phrase: "A man without land is a nobody."

Animated by a desire to be a somebody, Duddy finds the key to his salvation at the Hotel Lac Des Sables in Ste. Agathe, where he toils as a waiter during the summer season.

There, as he gamely deflects mean -spirited taunts from a snobbish McGill student who regards Duddy as a money grubber and a generator of anti-Semitism, Duddy is seized by a vision.

After Yvette shows him a crystalline lake, Duddy remembers his grandfather's admonition. With Yvette acting as the official purchaser, he buys some of the land around the lake from an anti-Semitic French Canadian farmer.

To finance further purchases of lake-side property, Duddy contacts Jerry Dingelman, the so-called "boy wonder" who's little more than a drug runner and establishes a film company with the assistance of Farber. Then, fortuitously, he finds a sodden, down-and-out British filmmaker to make his over-the-top bar mitzvah films.

These scenes, which poke good-humoured fun at Montreal's Jewish community, are deliciously wicked. And Dreyfuss, who carries the film, is never less than sizzling.

Duddy, a comedy of manners and class antagonisms, makes the difficult transition from novel to movie with ease. Thirty years later, it is still one of the finest films ever made in Canada.

CONCORDIA UNIVERSITY HOSTS TWO-DAY YIDDISH SYMPOSIUM

Award-winning author and playwright Robert Majzels and acclaimed Yiddish novelist Chava Rosenfarb are among the guest participants of Traduire le Montréal Yiddish/ New Readings of Yiddish Montreal, a two-day symposium on Yiddish in Montreal to take place at Concordia University next week.

Yiddish was the third most important literary language in Montreal in the first half of the 20th century, a time when the city's flourishing community of writers and readers made it "the Jerusalem of the North."

The symposium is being presented by Concordia's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies, its French studies department, Le groupe de recherche Le soi et l'autre and the Montreal Jewish Public Library. Members of the organizing committee include Rebecca Margolis, Norman Ravvin, Sherry Simon and Pierre Anctil.

It is expected to bring together critics, creative writers and translators to discuss and learn about such topics as "The Cultural History of Yiddish Montreal," "Moving Between Cultures" and "Writers Rewriting the Yiddish Heritage." Proceedings take place in French and English and admission is free.

Concordia University, Hall Building, 1455 de Maisonneuve Blvd. W., Room H-767. Wednesday and Thursday, March 10 and 11, 9:30 a.m. to 9 p.m. 514-848-2424, ext. 7507. yidcon@aol.com

Israeli Film: The Toronto Jewish Film Festival's Chai Tea and a Movie series concludes with the Israeli film Broken Wings, writer-director Nir Bergman's award-winning depiction of a middle-class Israeli mother of four who struggles to keep the family together following the sudden death of the patriarch.

"Having already garnered a dozen awards, the film is rich with beautiful imagery and sharply drawn characters," according to a TJFF press release. "It marks the start of what promises to be a brilliant career for Nir Bergman."

Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Grande Cinemas. $15 in advance or at the door. Sunday, March 7; chai tea at 4 p.m., screening at 5. 416-324-9121.

Names in the News: The award-winning children's Holocaust book Remember Not to Forget is popular enough that the Jewish Publication Society (JPS) of Philadelphia recently published a second edition. The illustrated work provides a history of anti-Semitism and the Holocaust that is recommended for children ages six and up. So it comes as a momentary shock to learn that the author is Norman H. Finkelstein – not to be confused with the notorious Holocaust denier with a very similar name.

"Yes, I certainly am aware of the 'other' Norman Finkelstein, the one with the [middle initial] G.," the gentleman advised us recently by e-mail. "That is why I always use my middle initial, H., on my books. I'm often asked if I am that guy. I only hope, since sometimes our books are intertwined when searching our last name on Amazon, etc., that I am causing him the same degree of embarrassment he causes me."

A librarian at Hebrew College in Boston, Norman H. Finkelstein is also the author of the much-praised Forged in Freedom: Turning Points in American Jewish History, which appeared two years ago. He is currently writing a new work for JPS.

New Schindler's List DVD includes testimony from his survivors

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Steven Spielberg's 1993 masterpiece Schindler's List is finally being released on DVD this month.

The winner of seven Academy Awards, including best picture and best director, Schindler's List is arguably the best film ever made about the Holocaust.

Adapted from Thomas Keneally's novel, it tells the true story of Oskar Schindler, played by Liam Neeson.

Itzhak Stern (Ben Kinglsey) with Oskar Schindler (Liam Neeson).

Schindler, an opportunistic German businessman, seeks to profit from the war by converting a confiscated crockery factory in Krakow into a mess-kit factory for German troops. In doing so, he employs 1,100 Jews from the nearby ghetto – the cheapest form of labour available.

Schindler is obviously motivated by money and making a quick profit. But, as we see, after the ghetto's liquidation and the residents' transfer to a labour camp, Schindler begins to develop a connection with his workers and is bothered by their cruel treatment in the camp.

Later, using a mixture of smooth talking and bribery, Schindler is able to rescue "his" Jews from their fate in Auschwitz by transferring them to a new factory in Czechoslovakia.

Schindler risked his life and virtually all his money in the process. The movie's final scene showing his real survivors and the actors who portrayed them laying stones on his gravestone is touching.

Watching this movie for the first time since its theatrical release, I was as moved by this powerful drama as I was then. One example that comes to mind is the heart-wrenching scene when the mothers see their children being driven away from them at the labour camp.

In addition to Neeson, Ralph Fiennes as the sadistic camp commander Goeth and Ben Kinglsey as the accountant Itzhak Stern give brilliant performances.

The DVD's extra footage includes a well-done 77-minute documentary produced by the Shoah Foundation. Voices From The List narrates the Schindler story through the voices of some of his survivors.

The DVD's release marks the 10th anniversary of the founding of the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation and the release of Giving Voice – a reality-based program for high-school students.

A collector's gift set will also be available featuring a book of powerful images from the film and commentary by Spielberg. John Williams' soundtrack with Itzhak Perlman's performance is also included in the gift set.

Schindler's List will also be released on VHS.

Ten years after its conception, the Shoah Foundation now contains nearly 52,000 interviews collected in 56 countries and recorded in 32 languages. Through the educational use of its testimonies, the foundation hopes to overcome prejudice, intolerance and bigotry.

Rap mogul combats anti-Semitism

By RICHARD ROSENBAUM
Special to The CJN

American rap mogul Russell Simmons has co-authored an article with a rabbi encouraging the black community to help combat anti-Semitism.

Simmons is the founder of both the pioneering hip-hop record label, Def Jam, and Rush Artist Management, which has produced performers such as influential rap groups the Beastie Boys, and Run DMC.

The article, for which Simmons collaborated with Rabbi Marc Schneier, founder and president of the Foundation for Ethnic Understanding, appeared in Jewish and African American newspapers in the United States last month to coincide with Martin Luther King Day. In it, the authors write, "Horrific expressions of anti-Semitism are spreading across the United States and the world.... We appeal to black Americans to stand in solidarity with their Jewish brothers and sisters who face the scourge and evils of anti-Semitism."

The article further says, "A recent national poll by the Foundation for Ethnic Understanding found that 77 per cent of blacks and 73 per cent of Jews agree that they should work together on civil rights."

This is not the first time a prominent member of the hip-hop community has promoted a Jewish cause. Last year, the rap group Wu-Tang Clan announced its plans to do a performance tour of Israel to show solidarity with the Israeli people. One Wu-Tang member, Remedy, is Jewish.

Reactions to Simmons' article have been mixed. There has been wide praise from both Jewish and Black sources, as well as wide criticism. On various African American and rap-oriented Internet websites reporting on the story, Simmons has been encouraged to work on bringing together the American black community itself before focusing on Black-Jewish relations. He has also been accused of attempting to ingratiate himself with the Jewish community.

In addition, posters on Jewish websites have taken Simmons to task for his support of Palestinian causes and his ongoing friendship with Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan – although it should be noted that Simmons is known to have privately encouraged Farrakhan to tone down the level of his infamously anti-Semitic rhetoric.

Nevertheless, the controversy only proves that many are taking note of this call for renewed ties between the two traditionally oppressed communities.

The article quotes a statement from civil rights leader Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.: "In the struggle for human rights, as well as in the struggle for the upward march of our civilization, we have deep need for the partnership, fellowship and courage of our Jewish brother."

Jewish general to restructure reserves before retiring

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"What's a nice Jewish boy doing in a business like this?"

Maj.-Gen. Edward Fitch, the highest ranking Jewish officer in the Canadian army and apparently its only Jewish general, has been asked that question repeatedly – half in jest.

A graduate of the Royal Military College and the sole Jew in his 1971 graduating class, Fitch gave a stock answer in a recent interview. "I wanted to be an engineer and a soldier," he said.

Fitch, whose assignments have taken him across Canada, Europe and the Middle East, is currently in charge of restructuring the army's reserves. It will be his last posting before he retires.

Fitch, who turns 55 this month, the mandatory retirement age in the army, has been asked to stay on for another two years to finish this complex task. His mandate is to modernize the reserves – to make them "credible, capable, sustainable and relevant" by increasing forces, improving training and replacing obsolete and worn out equipment.

Appointed a general in 1999, Fitch is aware that two previous attempts in the last decade to revamp the reserves, which have stagnated after years of neglect, failed abysmally.

Not surprisingly, he has run into resistance. But as of last week, Fitch, who is based in Ottawa at national defence headquarters, had already finished phase one of the restructuring, and he expects to complete the job.

Speaking of the Canadian forces in general, he said they are underfunded and require a massive infusion of money.

"We've been living with a disequilibrium between our resources and our tasks," said Fitch. "That's wearing us down seriously in terms of equipment and soldiers."

He remains hopeful that the federal government will address the problem.

At five foot ten and 175 pounds and sporting a bushy walrus moustache, Fitch is a person whose fierce resolve to succeed belies his gentle manner.

He was born in Montreal to Burton and Buelah Fitch, whose Austrian and Russian families immigrated to Canada in the late 19th century.

In 1912, two years before the birth of Fitch's father, the family name – which was originally Feiczewicz – was anglicized by Louis Fitch, a lawyer, Jewish community leader, Quebec politician and Fitch's grandfather's cousin.

During World War II, Fitch's father – an insurance broker in civilian life – was a Canadian army infantry rifle platoon commander in Europe. His uncle, Max, was a medical officer who retired around 1970 with the rank of colonel.

By the age of nine, Fitch, who grew up in Montreal's Notre Dame de Grace district, knew he wanted to join the army.

"My father and uncle were subliminal models," he said.

Fresh out of West Hill High School, he enrolled at Royal Military College, where he studied civil engineering.

"RMC offers one of the finest engineering degrees in Canada, and all your expenses are covered," he said.

His decision to be a soldier pleased his father but not his mother. Buelah Fitch, the mother of three boys and a girl, never forgot her husband's two-year absence from home during the war.

"Mom was not too happy," he said.

Promoted to his present position in December 2001, Fitch started his long, distinguished career as an officer in Valcartier, Que.

Moving steadily through the ranks, he was a field engineer in Germany, an instructor in British Columbia (where his two daughters, Rena, 23, and Leora, 18, were born) and the commander of a combat engineering regiment.

In 1988, he was transferred to the command and staff college in Toronto, and four years later, he was named commandant of the School of Military Engineering.

When he was a cadet and junior officer, Fitch would sometimes hear "unthinking, stupid" remarks about Jews from fellow soldiers. But since then, he has not heard a single anti-Semitic statement in the army.

"To counter that, I found a way to let new people know I'm of the Jewish faith."

Besides, he said, Canadian soldiers are liberal-minded, well-educated and worldly.

After making colonel in 1994, Fitch was appointed director of military engineering. He has built bridges, roads and defensive fortifications, and although he served in a war zone in the former Yugoslavia, he has never seen any action.

"In the perfect military operation, not a shot is fired," he said.

From 1995 to 1996, Fitch was based in Zagreb, Croatia, as engineer in the United Nations Protection Force, and then in Sarajevo, Bosnia, as assistant chief engineer in the Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps.

He supervised the construction of accommodation for NATO troops, provided vital services to refugees, maintained roads, disposed of explosives and mines and restored power.

In Croatia and Bosnia, Fitch said, he lived up to the Jewish notion of tikkun olam.

"What the Canadian army was doing fit my temperament and philosophy," he said. "To repair the world."

"Look at what the Canadian army has been doing for the past 30, 40 years," he added, referring to Canada's post-World War II role as a peacemaker. "Bringing peace and rebuilding countries. Going into bad places and making them better."

After Yugoslavia, Fitch was seconded to the department of foreign affairs to advise officials on how best to implement the provisions of the Ottawa Convention, which bans the use of anti-personnel mines. In that capacity, he travelled to such Arab nations as Jordan, Egypt and Yemen.

But his request to serve with Canadian peacekeeping troops in the Middle East was rejected.

At that time, in line with Canadian policy, Jewish and Muslim soldiers were ineligible for such duties, the rationale being that they might expose themselves to unnecessary risks. Nor did Canada want to be seen as less than impartial.

Fitch, who is a member of the board of Machzikei Hadas Congregation in Ottawa and a former sharpshooter with the Canadian Maccabiah team, agreed with this policy, which has since been phased out.

The general, who recently visited Canadian troops in Kabul, Afghanistan, commanded western Canadian forces after his appointment as a brigadier general. He rates this position as one of the highlights of his career.

Fitch and his wife, Sharon, a registered nurse who graduated from Montreal's Jewish General Hospital, plan to live in Victoria, B.C. after he retires.

There is no shortage of options for Fitch, a motorcycle buff, in his retirement mode.

"Do I want to work? Will I do voluntary work? We'll see. It's under study."

New diabetes treatments on horizon: researcher

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

New technologies and the increasing pace of research will do much to improve the health and quality of life of diabetics, says Daniel Drucker, director of the University of Toronto's Banting and Best Diabetes Centre.

"Mind you," he acknowledged, "it will be much easier for the young, who have grown up with computers and complicated technology, to accept them than for older people, who have less experience and a lower comfort level."

Drucker was speaking at a recent meeting of the Jewish Diabetes chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association.

Part of the problem in developing new methods of treatment is that "even for the same person, with everything exactly the same, the blood sugar level can be different each time it is tested."

Not only that, exercise, diabetes drugs, other medications, stress, and even other illnesses can affect those levels, he said.

So what can diabetics hope for in the future?

A long-lasting synthetic form of insulin, lantus, is now available in Europe and the United States, but not yet in Canada.

Drucker explained that since insulin only lasts 12 hours, there is the danger of blood sugar dropping to dangerous levels during the night. This could lead to major symptoms, including fainting, palpitations, even coma. Lantus, on the other hand, works for 16 to 18 hours, so the patient can take more before blood sugar levels reach dangerous lows.

Another new treatment, which Drucker said will probably be available in the next couple of years, is a continual glucose monitoring system. An implantable monitor, composed of tiny needles inserted under the skin, reads the levels of fluids circulating under the skin and is hooked up to a computer that delivers the proper amount of insulin.

"While it will be very expensive, it will be very efficient," Drucker said.

As well, it eliminates the need for ongoing blood sugar testing, with its accompanying uncomfortable finger-pricking.

Testing is also underway on medications that prevent complications of type 1 diabetes, in which the body attacks and destroys its own insulin-making cells.

The drugs will inhibit the actions of the proteins that cause problems, especially in the kidney and the eyes. A drug waiting for government approval works with insulin to slow down food absorption, causing weight loss.

Drucker added that "three quarters of the medications for type 2 diabetes, [formerly called adult onset diabetes] lead to weight gain," and weight gain only makes the condition worse.

In reply to a question from the audience about rumours of transplantation of islet cells from a donor pancreas, which promise to stabilize the insulin-producing organ's functioning, Drucker said the technique is not being used very much because of the lack of donors and the possibility of rejection.

Drucker said "revolutionary" methods that can actually regenerate insulin production are now in trials. "You might not have to completely transplant the whole pancreas – you might be able to just take some of it."

Research is also being done on interspecies transplants, such as from pigs. "The problem is that pigs have different immune symptoms, so there is even more chance of rejection. Scientists are trying to develop pigs that are compatible with humans."

As well, insulin pumps are being tested that can be programmed to test blood sugar at different times of the day and calculate how much is needed at any given time. However, the user must be technically savvy to be able to make it work, Drucker pointed out.

He said little research is being done on preventing type 1 diabetes – what used to be called juvenile onset diabetes – but some trials have shown that diet and exercise can help prevent adult onset type 2 diabetes.

"Randomized tests have shown that losing eight to 10 pounds can lower the risk of developing type 2 diabetes by 70 per cent."

Drucker noted that there have been tremendous advances in treating diabetes over the last few decades.

"Life will get better for diabetics," he promised. "Just never fast enough for those who have it now."

CCAA coach of the year prepares team for playoffs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

From his office in the athletics building at Humber College, the world is looking pretty good to Mike Katz.

Not only has his team, the Hawks, won five national college championships since 1990, but for the past five years or so, he's served as an assistant to national team coaches Jay Triano and Ken Shields.

Last season, Katz was named Canadian Colleges Athletic Association (CCAA) coach of the year after leading the Hawks to a bronze medal in the CCAA championships and a silver in the Ontario Colleges Athletic Association (OCAA).

As this year's playoffs beckon, the Hawks sit at 11-3 and are tied with rivals Sheridan for first place in the OCAA's Central Division.

Still, like others atop the food chain, Katz has to keep swimming to stay competitive and despite his enviable record over the years, he has had to adapt his coaching techniques to keep up with the current crop of hardcourt talent and the evolution of the game.

Katz believes his exposure to the international game, with its use of baseline staggered screens and quick transitions, helped him devise the coaching schemes that led Humber to national titles. In the early 1990s, he said, a lot of the bigger players who are now being recruited to U.S. universities remained in Canada. But by the end of the decade, many of these players were heading south to pursue their careers, so the talent pool available to Canadian schools was smaller, in both scope and stature. By the time Humber won its fifth championship in 2000-01, it fielded a lineup with no player taller than six-foot-four.

These smaller players lend themselves to the international-style game, with its quick transition, fast pace, outside shooting and emphasis on a broad range of skills.

For several years, Katz has worked at integrating elements of the international game into the Hawks' game plan. "The offensive scheme I use now has very much been influenced by international basketball," he said.

At the Sydney Olympics, Katz's role was to develop the Canadian team's offensive scheme and to scout other teams.

"I saw 28 of 30 pool games. By being exposed, I enhanced my knowledge and was able to implant it here at Humber."

To run an international style game, you need a team with a highly developed skill set, he said. Players need to be fast, good ball handlers and make smart decisions.

"Playing the game up-tempo can reward you with easy baskets, but the players tend to have turnovers. I've heard NBA teams saying their players are not skilled enough to play at the faster pace."

At Humber, Katz emphasizes passing and catching skills and encourages players to make good decisions on the court.

North American players, he said, have let these skills atrophy. The reason is simple: "Shooting is the fun part of the game."

A lot of big players are good at driving the net and slamming the ball, "but there are people who say there are not enough outside shooters."

Mike Katz

Katz's many years of coaching have given him the patience and experience to quickly notice tendencies as they develop and change tactics mid-game. But, he said, "good coaches win or lose games over the long haul in practice. Practice prepares your team for the adjusting moment."

He is not optimistic about the long-term state of the Canadian national team. There are some very good players who go on to the NBA and who answer when the national team calls (Dallas' Steve Nash is a quintessential example). But most good college and university players have few ways of improving their skills after they graduate, he said.

Without a national basketball league – a hoops version of the CFL – Canada will always be scrambling to put together a competitive international team, he said.

As well, there are only a handful of Jewish university players across the country today. Jewish kids were once much more prominent in the higher echelons of basketball, particularly in the 1970s and even earlier. There are still a few around, like Katz's son, Ben, who plays for McMaster and who was recently named an Ontario University Athletics West first team all-star. The third-year player received his first all-star selection in large part due to his shooting accuracy, averaging 16.5 points per game.

Katz believes that with the Jewish community's general affluence, kids no longer live in neighbourhoods where competitive street games are constantly on the go.

Katz, who played for the 1977 and 1981 Canadian Maccabiah teams, expects he will be asked to coach Canada's team at the Games next summer.

He already has his eye on eight or nine potential recruits playing intercollegiate basketball.

But, he said, casual weekend players just can't cut it these days – you need people playing every day. Nothing less will be good enough to get past the United States and Israel.

Binghampton winger struggles after banner year

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

David Hymovitz knows that as a professional hockey player, he is seen as a star in his local community. And while things haven't gone all that well for him this season on the ice, he continues to take great pleasure in the charitable work he does as an ambassador of the game away from the rink.

The "Man of the Year" last season with the Binghampton Senators of the American Hockey League (AHL), Hymovitz was recently asked to make a return speaking engagement at Hillel Academy in Binghampton, a request he is happy to fulfil.

"That was me, 10, 15 years ago, sitting there listening to people talk," the 5-11, 190-pound left winger recalled after the club's 4-3 loss in Toronto last month. "I always enjoy going over there.

"Every city I've been in over my eight-year career, I like to get involved in the community, whether it's talking to kids in schools or around the holidays donating gifts to not-so-privileged kids. We just try to do what we can."

Signed by Ottawa Senators, Binghampton's parent team, as a free agent on July 13, 2001, Hymovitz has struggled to find his game this season after playing a key role on last year's AHL eastern division championship team. The penalty-killing specialist led Binghampton with four short-handed goals and was a +13 on the year, playing from February with a dislocated shoulder.

He underwent off-season surgery to repair the damage, did rehab over the summer, and now says it's back to 100 per cent.

Through his first 49 games of the season, Hymovitz had just six goals, three assists and a team-worst -16 rating.

Hymovitz missed 10 games this season with another shoulder injury.

The 29-year-old Randolph, Mass., native has been around the loop since being chosen by the Chicago Blackhawks in the ninth round of the 1992 NHL entry draft. He stayed close to home, playing at Boston College for four years while earning a communications degree before turning pro.

Hymovitz was a member of the silver-medal winning U.S. hockey team at the 15th Maccabiah Games in 1997, the first and only time the sport was included in the quadrennial competition.

He says his first-ever trip to Israel was a "once-in-a-lifetime" experience.

"It was just an absolute blast," said Hymovitz, who attended the games with his parents and older brother Marc. "We spent about two weeks touring around the country, seeing all the history, where you're from. You go over to Israel to play hockey, but hockey was kind of on the back burner."

Now in his fourth full AHL season, Hymovitz spent most of his first year as a pro with Columbus of the East Coast Hockey League before catching on with the International Hockey League's (IHL) Indianapolis Ice at the tail end of the 1996-97 campaign.

He spent two more seasons with the Ice. In his second year with the team, he was named an IHL second team all star, scoring 46 goals and adding 30 assists in 76 games. The Los Angeles Kings signed him as a free agent following that 1998-99 season.

Hymovitz was invited to his first NHL training camp the next fall, but he has yet to play a game at the big-league level.

"It's an exciting time, just being in an NHL camp," said Hymovitz, who attended one other camp with L.A. and the past two with Ottawa.

"I still kind of hope that dream, get one game up at least. That's why you play in the American League, hopeful that day will come."

Helping New York's poor is an ongoing job

By ELISHEVA GOULD

As a participant of the year-long AVODAH Jewish Service Corps program in New York City, I work as a legal advocate in the Urban Justice Center's Homelessness Outreach and Prevention Project (HOPP). I mentioned last month how each Jewish Service Corps volunteer works regular office hours – and then some – at a non-profit organization for the year. My tasks include supervising a weekly legal clinic, taking on individual client's cases, giving advice and referrals to other local legal organizations and helping with the intake process at another weekly clinic.

Every weekday, HOPP conducts legal clinics in soup kitchens and drop-in centres, where homeless and poor New Yorkers go to meet their needs. Hungry and impoverished people in the Bronx, Harlem, Chelsea and Bedford Stuyvesant in Brooklyn also go to various citywide church facilities to get food and clothing, and they know when our legal clinics meet at each location. They visit the clinics when they have trouble accessing their welfare or medicare benefits or food stamps. We also take cases for clients who, for countless different reasons, can no longer afford their rent, and are in housing court proceedings and facing eviction.

Each HOPP legal advocate and lawyer manages an independent caseload of homeless and marginally housed clients whom he or she sees at the clinic or in the office. We also represent clients at fair hearings, which are presided over by an administrative law judge and are conducted between a city representative from the welfare centre and a legal advocate. Most fair hearings challenge the city's attempt to close our clients' public benefits cases because they allegedly failed to report to one of the many tedious assessments, meetings, appointments and referral and evaluation sessions they must attend in order to receive their welfare benefits. More often than not, however, it is an error in mailing or scheduling from the welfare or "job" centre that generates a client's case closing. Therefore, we win many of our hearings.

I learned quickly that the welfare system here is deeply flawed, bureaucratic and frustrating. It makes people who are in terrible poverty, have a mental illnesses and/or a lack of education jump through impossible hoops only to receive a monthly government stipend that is scarcely enough to survive on. For example, the maximum "shelter allowance" welfare will give to a single person in New York City is $215 (US) a month. Anyone who is aware of the exorbitant cost of living in New York will understand why that allowance is laughable and why our legal clinics see so many rent arrears cases. Compounding the inadequacy of welfare's rental grant is the utter shortage of affordable and habitable subsidized housing in the city.

Due to these miserable conditions, a legal advocate's job is never done. Each day – and well into most evenings – it is our great challenge to find private charities or a non-overloaded welfare caseworker who will help our rent arrears clients get the money they need to avoid eviction. Each day, I meet with people who have seemingly insurmountable problems and desperate living situations, and it is my great challenge to do my best to help them within the capacity of the Urban Justice Center – a relatively small non-profit organization.

Although I often keep long hours at work, I've also been having a great deal of fun in both New York City and the AVODAH program. Stay tuned next month for more on how I spend my time here.

PURIM CONGO BARS

Purim is not just for children

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Let it be clear at the outset that I love Purim and have no problem with making it as relevant as possible to our children. But I have always been concerned that , more than any other Jewish holiday, Purim is to blame for what I call "pediatric Judaism."

Because of the masquerades, Purim shpiel, and noise-making in synagogue, Purim is seen as a children's holiday. While it is important for children to find meaning in Purim (and in all of Jewish life) at their level, Purim is not only for children.

In fact, there are aspects of this wondrous holiday that are very much not for children. The Esther story can be told to children in simple format, but the actual text of Megillat Esther is a complex literary gem that is best appreciated by critical adult readers with experience in reading belles lettres and with comprehensive knowledge of the various commentaries. The satire and burlesque of Purim shpielen throughout the ages is also beyond the ken of our children. Indeed, some of the early plays are even pornographic – for adults only. We have Purim parodies of sacred texts that require both deep knowledge of the originals and an adult sense of humour.

One of the failings of North American Jewish education is that we have infantilized Jewish life to such an extent that both children and their parents have come to believe that our customs and ceremonies are child's play. A child with an elementary school understanding of Jewish history and a child's version of Jewish holidays will grow up to be an adult who rejects Jewish life because of its infantile irrelevance.

Judaism is not a childhood disease that needs a cure, and Purim, like all of our holidays, has deep meaning beyond the masks and hamantashen that only adults can fully appreciate.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Has discrimination become the Ontario way?

Editorial

It's not that often Jews, Muslims and Christians take up a cause on the same side of the advocacy table. However, when it comes to schooling in this province, parents committed to religious education in all three communities have been frustrated by Ontario's commitment to equal education discrimination for all.

Since June 1984, when former Ontario premier William Davis announced that his government would extend full funding to Roman Catholic high schools, much has been written about the unfairness of a tax system that provides for public and Catholic schools while other religious groups receive no government support.

The CJN reported on the Supreme Court of Canada decision in 1996 that upheld Ontario's constitutional right to withhold funding to other religious schools, and the paper followed the 1999 United Nations Human Rights Committee decision that found Ontario's school funding practices discriminatory and in violation of the UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, signed by Canada with the approval of all the provinces.

After the UN decision, in a classic political passing-of-the-buck, the federal government neatly hid behind provincial claims to jurisdiction in educational issues, and Ontario smugly dismissed the United Nation's authority to rule on non-federal matters. It would seem that when it comes to the United Nations, the Canadian government is surprisingly selective about what it takes seriously.

South of the border, American Jewish groups have found themselves arguing against faith-based funding in defence of a public school system that has historically provided immigrant communities with access to the mainstream world.

However, in the United States, as in Canada, groups shut out of the equal opportunity charade have also begun actively looking for change. Many African American communities are lobbying for educational alternatives to the cycle perpetuated by poor schools in low-income neighbourhoods. Four American states, including Florida, Ohio, Wisconsin and Colorado, as well as Washington, D.C., have recently approved private school vouchers as a way to transform the public school system.

Whether vouchers will work remains to be seen. What has become clear is that despite efforts by supporters of the status quo, minorities shut out of a discriminatory environment usually press for change.

This year, the Live 'n Learn supplement has included a summary of a roundtable discussion sponsored by The CJN on issues related to Jewish education, as well as articles about free speech on campus, the challenge of teaching Zionism in high schools, strategies for motivating boys and educating babies, and choices students now face in high school.

> For the first time, we've included the CJN Purim Poster in the middle of the supplement

For the first time, we've included the CJN Purim Poster in the middle of the supplement.

As always, it has been difficult to decide which issues to include. There is a lot of news to choose from, all of it complex and engaging. It has helped that readers have let us know about their concerns. Parents tell us about discussion groups they've formed and e-mail petitions they've organized, about their frustrations over the Ontario Liberal government's cancellation of the tax credit for private school tuition and their worries about the rising costs of Jewish education.

And while many have called our offices to complain about a provincial system that favours one religion over all others, there are those who have decided to disengage from the discussion and accept discrimination as a way of life in Ontario. That's the saddest news of all.

The best educational tool for pre-schoolers is you

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Goldie Plotkin has had occasion to witness today's highly ambitious parents up close.

You know, the ones who expect their three- or four-year-old to be reading and writing, if not already calculating quadratic equations.

She's seen the overly harried mom, shlepping her child from one reading-readiness class to the next. She's read the New York Times article about the high expectations placed on infants and toddlers by their parents, who worry that enrolling their children in the right pre-school will have a bearing on which university they will will later attend.

Her sister in New York, who also works in early childhood education, tells her about the demanding, hard-driving parents who want to give their children a good start in life.

So what is Plotkin's message to stressed-out parents who only want the best for their children?

"The greatest educational gift you can give your children is you – your smile, your role-modelling," she says.

At Torah Tots, a Jewishly oriented pre-school affiliated with Chabad of Markham, Plotkin has set up a relaxed learning environment that is "sensory-based" and puts into practice the ancient Hebrew proverb, "Educate a child according to his way."

In keeping with that philosophy, Torah Tots provides a variety of learning environments for its 100 children, who range in age from 2½ to five years old.

Most of the learning is done by doing, whether by working with materials such as clay or dough, by learning about measurements and proportions through baking, or by acting out a real-life experience like shopping.

"I may be old fashioned, but I'm a strong advocate of real-life experiences," Plotkin says.

She's not impressed by highly promoted educational videos with impressive names that suggest that by watching them, your infant might become the next Einstein or Beethoven.

Flash cards, another educational product on the market, have only limited utility, Plotkin says, since children usually learn better from real-life experience. And she considers music CDs, such as "Baby Mozart" compilations, to be merely accessories to good learning. She agrees that classical music CDs promote a calm learning environment, and Torah Tots uses them so "children come in and are relaxed."

As for videos, she believes they are only helpful for keeping children occupied temporarily. "Visuals are a small part of a broader education, and children need broader experiences to be a whole child," she says.

Nevertheless, the market for educational videos is huge. With a name such as "Baby Einstein" attached to it, the marketers' message is clear: expose your child to these videos and he or she will be well on the way to a lifetime of high achievement.

Baby Einstein, one of many creators of infant development media, is now part of the Disney media empire. The company's website claims its "videos, DVDs, discovery cards, books and audio CDs expose your little ones to the world around them through the use of real world objects, music, art, language, science, poetry and nature… Designed specifically for infants and toddlers, our products provide fun and stimulating ways for parents and caregivers to interact and enrich their children's lives."

CERTIFICATE PROGRAM IN SPECIAL EDUCATION

Tikun Chaim, the Special Education division of UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and York University, are initiating an innovative program in special education for teachers currently teaching in the Jewish school system.

The main goals of this program are:

- To develop an understanding of the variety of exceptionalities teachers may encounter and ways to address them
- To stimulate growth of knowledge and develop enriched teaching techniques
- To expand ways to maximize the learning opportunities of all students across the spectrum of exceptionalities
- To learn how to tailor Judaic/Hebrew Studies and General Studies curricula for the multi-level classroom

OCT teachers will be eligible to receive AQ certification
Midrasha and non-OCT teachers will receive a Special Education Certificate

Enrolment is limited.

Sensory inputs key in early years

Appealing to babies' natural curiosity, the videos are certainly attractive to infants, if my 11-month-old son Matthew is any indication. But then so is looking out the window at the trees and bushes in the backyard, or out the front window at the cars and people going by.

So how much benefit do babies get from educational media toys that promise a learning experience?

Marie Goulet, a professor in the early childhood education program at George Brown College, is skeptical of educational media that require children to sit in front of a television set.

"One of the big issues is that when we're doing one thing, we're not doing another thing," Goulet says. "Sitting in front of a TV and watching shapes is not something we're intended to do."

Though she believes "all things should be done in moderation," she says too much TV keeps children away from other beneficial activities, such as socializing with other children, running around, or bonding with their parents.

It's been known for some time in education circles that children are natural learners, Goulet says. In the 1960s, clinical researcher Glenn Doman advanced many ideas on ways to stimulate a baby's brain. His 1964 book How To Teach Your Baby to Read argued that not only can pre-school children be taught to read, they love to do so.

"The North American thing is to take something that happens naturally and to make it go quicker," Goulet says.

It's a phenomenon she sees at George Brown's day-care centre, where parents expect their children to learn more and more.

Infants are "scientists inside the crib," exploring their environment through simple experiments such as manipulating everyday objects and observing how they react to their input. There's no evidence that flash cards provide a particular benefit and the value of music to stimulating the part of the brain involved in spatial reasoning – the so-called "Mozart affect" – is believed to last for only 10 minutes, Goulet says.

"But, if you listen to Mozart and enjoy it and the child enjoys being with you, that's the important thing," she says. "If parents substitute [listening to music] for time spent with the baby, that's detrimental."

At a young age, "early sensory inputs are really important" – touching, feeling, smelling, tasting, seeing. Music and educational videos, flash cards and other tools have not been shown to have any particular long-term educational benefit, though if they bring parents and children closer together, they can help cement parent/child bonds, Goulet says.

She raises another fascinating element about the early childhood educational experience: research shows that "joy and happiness are neurological responses and are highly connected to learning. They take a role in transferring learning to long-term memory."

Matthew Lungen

In other words, if a child has fun learning, they will retain what they learn.

Dale Shipley, director of the school of early childhood education at Ryerson University, also stresses the personal touch when it comes to an infant's development.

Babies are stimulated by the rhythm, cadence and tonal qualities of music, including "Baby Mozart" compilations, Shipley says, but "singing is the best way to communicate musically with your child. It involves an emotional interaction, and that's what really counts."

Videos "have very limited value," she says. They're not intrinsically bad, but the best way to expose an infant to the physical world is to get them on the rug, let them feel their way, and expose them to a variety of objects.

"They need active interaction with concrete objects in their environment" as a way of developing their senses, she says.

Videos are a passive medium and should be used sparingly. They should not be used to babysit a child, and should be seen as "a special treat, not as daily entertainment."

Toys with flashing lights that can entrance a child are nothing more than entertainment, Shipley says, though she concedes that toys that respond to a child's stimulus can have educational value.

Still, simple objects such boxes, blocks and naturally occurring materials are even better for kids, she says. "They allow children to use an object to stand for something else."

A block could be a car and a group of blocks, a house.

As well, materials such as clay and plasticine allow children to be creative. The material responds to their input and "that develops their imagination and cognitive abilities," Shipley says.

She recommends:

• play materials that respond to a child's input, such as blocks, construction materials, clay, plasticine, paints, chalk, push/pull toys. These are toys that develop infants' hand-eye co-ordination and are good for children up to age six.

• toys with "responsiveness criteria" that allow children to develop their senses of sight, hearing, taste, touch and smell.

• toys that help children develop their symbolic thinking. Even plain materials can, in a child's imagination, stand in for something else.

"Parents first need to be aware that their children will develop and learn through interaction with the environment. That experience with many concrete objects is very important and that is more important than early reading or math programs."

If you push children too early into reading or arithmetic, you risk turning them off learning in later years, she adds.

Better yet, Shipley says, get a book and read to your children. "That can't be emphasized enough. It's critical to them becoming good readers."

Will high schoolers be ready for anti-Zionism on campus?

By SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

Day schools and advocacy groups are launching new programs in a bid to improve Israel's image on campus, but are future university students being adequately prepared?

The answer depends on whom you ask.

Marra Messinger, director of community development for the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), worked on a high school Israel advocacy curriculum for three months and has just started bringing it to Jewish schools in Toronto. She believes the program will give university students the confidence to stand up and argue Israel's case.

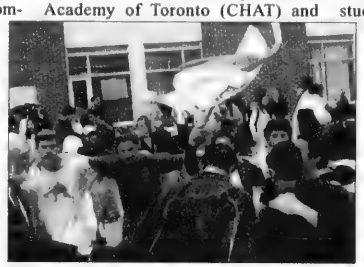
"It is an effective advocacy tool because they get rid of their fear," she says. "We're telling them what they're likely to see on campus, giving them the tools to fight anti-Israel propaganda."

The project, which was funded with a $10,000 start-up donation from the Shiff Family Foundation, is being developed by CIC and implemented in conjunction with Hillel. Messinger trained 12 university students and recent graduates every weekend for a month on how to present the curriculum to high schoolers.

Through four to five sessions of skits, role playing, exercises and discussions, the high schoolers learn what advocacy is and how to analyze Palestinian propaganda, deal with various possible difficult scenarios and deliver visual messages about Israel that use emotion rather than facts and figures. The course also encourages the students to promote Israeli arts and culture.

"We want students to be proactive in their advocacy," Messinger says. "Not to attack, but to set the agenda."

The sessions, which began last month at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and Ulpanat Orot/Yeshivat Or Chaim Bnei Akiva Schools, have been praised by the administrations of both schools. Though they are not allowed to sit in on the course – CIC insists on a student-to-student format – they have seen the curriculum and are impressed. At CHAT, the program is being taught to Grade 12 students, while at Ulpana and Or Chaim, it's mandatory for grades 10, 11 and 12.



Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) students dance with the Israeli flag.

"I think that the people who the CIC brought in were excellent," says Frank Samuels, general studies principal of Ulpana and Or Chaim. "I think Marra and her team have put together something good here."

Samuel Kapustin, CHAT's director of Jewish studies, says "We only [have had] one session [so far], but I was very impressed" with it. "Student reaction was positive and I'm very hopeful and confident that it will be a very good program."

Talia Radcliffe, a Grade 12 CHAT student, wants more historical background to go with the emotional appeals. "[The presenters] said to us, 'It's not what you say, it's how you say it.' I agree with that to a certain extent. But I think that alongside the tools, you need hard-core facts."

It's not enough to simply promote Israeli culture, says Radcliffe, who is also president of CHAT's student council. "Most poets talk about the conflict. Unless there's some background understanding, you can't even begin to know what they're talking about."

And any student on campus today will agree that a certain level of knowledge is necessary to discuss Middle East politics.

Radcliffe is worried most of her peers don't have that level of knowledge. "[The] interest level [at CHAT] is definitely very high. People want to know more [to be advocates for Israel] but don't feel they have the knowledge to do so... Having said that, I know that CHAT is working to bring up the knowledge level."

Teacher of Excellence Awards
The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.
-William Arthur Ward-
We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.
We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate
• Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
• Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
• Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
• Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices
Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.
Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is April 26th, 2004.

In addition to the CIC program, CHAT students are required to take both a Jewish history course in Grade 9 that introduces them briefly to modern Israel and a Jewish history course in Grade 11 that contains a unit on Zionism. Grade 12 students have the option of taking a course that looks at the Holocaust for the first semester and at modern Israel from the Balfour Declaration to today in the second semester. The school also has regular Israel-related activities, including a Birthright trip for Grade 12 students last year, as well as a student Israel Affairs Committee and schlichim who teach Jewish studies courses. Kapustin says the school is also planning additional programs for next year.

Meanwhile, at Ulpana and Or Chaim, Samuels acknowledges that students are not taught much formal modern Israeli history, aside from the second semester of a required Grade 10 Jewish history course that looks at modern Israel from the creation of the state to the current intifadah.

"It's a lack we need to fill," he says. But he stresses that the Zionist schools' main goal is not to teach kids to counter anti-Israel propaganda.

"I'm not educating in order to defend," he says. "Whatever history we teach, it's not because of what is happening today. Whatever we teach is because it's an important part of what our students should learn and know."

He argues what makes Ulpana and Or Chaim students aware of Israel's importance is the schools' strong Israel-related programming, from a Birthright Israel trip last year to annual Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations to its schlichim.

"The school smells of Israel," he says. "I think it gives [the students] a strong sense of knowledge to begin with so that when they're challenged, they have a sense about what they're talking about."

But some students argue that even such a strong pro-Israel environment is not enough to give them the skills they need to defend the Jewish state, and they say in today's climate, it is crucial that they be able to do so.

One CHAT student, who asked not to be named, says, students are "saturated with Israel stuff" – but not the right stuff.

"CHAT is supposed to be a community school and I don't know if they're addressing a wide range of political views," he says. "There's no debate. The way they present it is sort of one-sided and they don't give the other side a chance… There needs to be criticism of Israel so we can deal with that on campus."

Tom Chervinsky, who graduated from CHAT in 2001 and is now in his third year at the University of Waterloo, agrees.

One of CHAT's "major failings," he says, is that "there's very little discussion as to why Israel has the right to exist." The problem with this from a student's perspective, Chervinsky says, is that "you haven't heard the arguments [against it] before, so you're not prepared for it.

"'Cause God said so' doesn't work on a university campus."

Frank Samuels

Chervinsky speaks from experience. He is the outreach co-ordinator for the Waterloo Israel Political Affairs Committee (WIPAC), one of two small pro-Israel groups that frequently goes head to head with four different anti-Israel groups: the Muslim Student Association, Muslim Students for Universal Justice, the Arab Students Association and Students for Palestinian Rights. The campus has between 200 and 250 Jewish students and 1,000 or more Muslim and Arab students.

It's "a very difficult campus environment. We're fighting an uphill battle," Chervinsky says.

Kapustin says he isn't against the idea "at an intellectual level" of discussing whether Israel has a right to exist, but he is adamant that "parents don't send their kids to [CHAT] to debate" the issue, because Israel's existence is a given.

CHAT provides students with various points of view and "allows students to come to conclusions on their own," he says.

"There's no way we can possibly prepare a student fully for what happens on campus. We try to give them a taste of what it's like."

Jerry Weinberg, one of three CHAT teachers of the Grade 12 Jewish history course, says he looks at both the Arab and Israeli perspectives in his class "from [the point of view of] somebody who believes in the state of Israel" and that Palestinians have a right to their own state.

"I often tell students that their Zionism is strengthened with a full perspective… It's important for them to see what the other side says… so that when an argument comes, they're prepared for it."

Being educated is important, Weinberg says, but "the more immediate need" is "to give [students] reassurance so that they don't melt [when confronted on campus], because some of them do melt."

Darcie Richler, a 2002 Dalhousie University graduate who is the CIC's associate director of community development and helped recruit presenters for the program, says when she was on campus at the beginning of the intifadah and the aftermath of 9/11, "I felt I couldn't put my thoughts together and effectively say what needed to be said. I didn't know how to promote Israel at all."

She struggled in Dalhousie's "volatile" environment, she says. "We might have been winning the fact war, but we needed to win the PR war."

She believes the CIC program will help students do that, even if they are lacking knowledge about the Mideast conflict.

"Once you learn how to promote the Israel agenda, you'll find where the gaps are and you'll fill it in."

But Chervinsky disagrees.

"I worry about turning out more mouthpieces as opposed to activists. We need committed, skilled people who know what they're doing and bring new ideas and [are willing to] hop into the fray, as opposed to people who spout out lines and don't get involved or push the agenda."

He says CIC's idea of informing an uneducated public on the similarity between Canadian and Israeli democratic values is a "very good" one.

"We assume people know that Israel is a democracy, but they don't. They take a simple understanding and equate Israel to Iraq and divide the world into oppressors and oppressed."

But, he says, "time will tell if [the program] is working or not."

Public schools teach Holocaust lit

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

After The Diary of Anne Frank was published in 1947, several decades passed without a work of Holocaust literature for children being read so widely.

Today, Holocaust literature for children and young adults is blossoming and books are filling shelves in libraries, classrooms and homes throughout the globe.

Books such as Hana's Suitcase, written by Karen Levine and published in 26 countries, and The Secret of Gabi's Dresser by Kathy Kacer, have garnered numerous awards and become popular teaching tools.

"Children love stories… they can actually visualize," said Ilyse Lustig, a teacher at Ventura Park Public School in Thornhill who incorporates Holocaust literature into numerous lessons and projects.

Themes and values depicted in the books, such as "empathy, optimism [and] perseverance, are things they can relate to," Lustig said.

Students at Ventura Park Public School

Marie Davis Zimmerman, a University of Guelph English professor who co-edited Children of the Shoah: Holocaust Literature and Education, a special issue of the Canadian Children's Literature Journal, agreed that children identify with compelling characters.

"I think that educators have discovered that [Holocaust] literature works in powerful ways to mark the imaginations and memories of children and young adults," Davis Zimmerman said.

"I also think that the genocides in Rwanda and Yugoslavia in the mid-to late '90s awakened all of us to the fact that the horror is happening again."

Davis Zimmerman added that the steadily declining numbers of living Holocaust survivors has prompted a sense of urgency to record their memories while there is still time.

In most cases, educators use Holocaust literature to teach about the dangers of hatred and discrimination, which are serious and difficult topics for children.

"If the treatment of the truth is not handled well… it may very well frighten or jade children," said Davis Zimmerman, who is currently working on a book called Telling Tales of Trauma.

"I don't think any novel that treats only the evidence of evil can ever have the power that a novel such as Hana's Suitcase and The Secret of Gabi's Dresser can have, by virtue of the fact that that these novels also record the evidence of human nobility, through love, rescue and hope."

Davis Zimmerman believes the earliest age children should be exposed to a significant amount of Holocaust literature is seven.

Lustig agrees that it's "a very sensitive topic" and eases her students into Holocaust literature by teaching a variety of preparatory lessons.

"There is anguish and horror that goes along with studying the Holocaust, so I make sure the kids are properly prepared," she said.

Once her students are prepared to read books on the topic, Lustig said she usually selects a story that is appropriate for that particular group of students.

Growing demand for Holocaust books

Other teachers use the same approach, not necessarily selecting a book based on the students' reading levels.

For instance, at Rosedale Heights School of the Arts in downtown Toronto, The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, a story recommended for children aged nine-12 about the real-life experiences of a young Jewish girl in Czechoslovakia who hid from the Nazis in a dresser, was read by 16-19 year-old students.

"Even though it's simply written, they related to it," said teacher Nancy Clark, noting that almost all of students in the class were not Jewish.

"They liked it because it's a true story… If you have a novel to centre [the Holocaust] around, it's a more powerful way to learn about it."

Clark directed her students in a play based on the book, which was seen by close to 1,000 students from various schools last November.

"A lot of the kids from the public schools are immigrants. They know what it is to be an outsider, or maybe they've lost someone… so I think they can relate to the broader issue of equity," she said.

Clark said in preparing for the play, the students read diaries of children who were in the Holocaust, learned about the history of the time period and met with Holocaust survivors.

"It needed a teacher reviewing the history… to create a context," she said.

Meanwhile, Lustig's Grade 8 students were inspired by Hana's Suitcase, which is recommended for Grade 4 students.

The story chronicles the life and tragic death of Hana Brady, who was killed at the age of 13 in Auschwitz, as well as the remarkable odyssey of Japanese museum curator Fumiko Ishioka, who traced Hana's footsteps after being sent the suitcase Hana took to the death camp.

"After reading Hana's Suitcase, the kids became incredibly curious and… they wanted to teach other people their age about it," Lustig said.

The students created a unique exhibit titled Children of War: Our Children's Legacy, Our Children's Voices, which includes a song written by the students and recorded on CD, as well as a documentary video and an artistic component developed by the students with the help of artist Natalie McHaffie.

The exhibit, which contains a variety of visual displays, is being used as a teaching resource at several schools.

"With the Grade 8 students doing this project and bringing it to other students, it can hopefully make a difference," Lustig said.

Lustig believes students' growing demand for books on the topic will inevitably lead to more being published.

"Kids have become thirsty for more. They realize that's just one person's story and there are millions more, so they want to hear more," she said.

Program teaches student teachers about the Holocaust

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

As their emotional tour of Auschwitz-Birkenau ended last summer, 27 student teachers from three countries converged at the train tracks, lit a candle and prayed together.

"Everyone joined in. It was all totally unexpected," said Katherine Flynn of Toronto, a participant in The Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Anti-Racism Education at York University.

"It was a really powerful moment."

That moment signifies the camaraderie that has developed among the program's participants since they spent last August engaging in field study in Germany and Poland.

The group visited the historic site of the Wannsee Conference where the details of the Final Solution were planned, toured concentration camps and had many discussions.

Last month, the tight-knit group of seven student teachers each from Germany and Poland and 13 student teachers from York University, along with six mentoring professors, reunited in Toronto for a 10-day symposium.

The symposium, called "Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future," included an international conference on Holocaust and anti-racism education, projects and school visits aimed at helping the student teachers develop curriculum responses to racism and anti-Semitism in the classroom.

"It will be very important for me to incorporate my experiences [from the program] in the classroom," said Carina Wenzler, a student teacher from Germany who is a practicing Buddhist.

"It was a good experience, but it was hard. It changed our lives and we will be different people because of it."

Flynn said the international aspect of the program was the key to its success.

"The dialogue between the German, Polish and Canadian students was the best part of the trip," she said. "By being together, we learned so much from each other."

Seven different world religions are represented in the group, with only two of the 27 participants being Jewish.

Flynn's interest in the program was sparked by her experience teaching at an inner city Catholic high school in Toronto last year.

"When I mentioned the Holocaust, none of the kids in the class knew what it is," she recalled. "It was scary."

In response, Flynn taught a series of lessons on the Holocaust and on the larger theme of the dangers of hate.

"They were totally interested," she said.

Like the students in Flynn's class, Sanjee Sivanesan grew up in an area of Toronto that has no Jews, and at school, he learned little, if anything, about the Holocaust.

"It was glossed over… [just] as a chapter of the war," said Sivanesan, who has a Tamil-Indian background.

"I wanted to find out more. For me the [program] was about pure knowledge."

From the experience, Sivanesan said he has learned "how to deal with remarks that are thinly veiled anti-Semitism."

He said he also learned to draw parallels between the discrimination Jews have faced and that of his own ethnic group, the Tamils.

Iwona Trabka, a participant from Krakow, Poland, said Holocaust education in Polish classrooms is relatively new and age-old stereotypes of Jews persist among Polish youth.

"People without knowledge think Jews are rich, that they don't want to share with anyone… and they should take from the world because they've suffered the most," Trabka said.

"But there are people who want to learn about the topic."

Flynn noted a challenge for Holocaust education is the reluctance of some teachers to incorporate it in the curriculum.

"So many teachers are afraid to teach [about it]," Flynn said. "I think the Holocaust should be part of the curriculum, as should be the broader theme of hate.

"It's not just a Jewish issue. It's about humanity and hate everywhere."

The program, which is bi-annual, was conceived in 2001 by York University professors Michael Brown and Mark Webber.

High school parent-teacher interviews: the ultimate endurance test

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

I consider myself a fairly fit middle-aged woman. I do some weight training and I walk about two to three miles a day. But that's barely enough exercise to get me in shape for one of the most physically gruelling events of the year: parent-teacher interviews at my son's high school.

Twice a year on a given afternoon or evening, parents are allotted five minutes each with a number of teachers dispersed throughout the school, a massive, three-storey fortress in mid-town Toronto. With five or 10 minutes between interviews, parents need an incredible amount of stamina to get to the half dozen or so appointments on time.

The kids arrange the schedules. My son tells me he takes whatever time slot he can get. Well, he has yet to line up consecutive interviews in the same wing of the school, let alone the same floor.

And I can tell I'm not alone. You see parents of all shapes and sizes sprinting up two flights of stairs, red-faced and sweating, as they make their way through the labyrinth of corridors trying to locate the classrooms. That in itself is a challenge that can raise your blood pressure a notch or two. If you get lost and arrive late, you miss the interview.

As for dress, you will see parents in full business attire with briefcases in tow racing down the halls. But as a two-year veteran of these teacher conferences, I go for a more sensible look. I show up in sweats and cross-trainers, because this is literally a case of survival of the fittest.

But, hey, I've learned from experience. My first time was a fiasco. I had come to the school directly from work in a blazer and heels, lugging books. Accessible parking was extremely limited on that wet November afternoon. I couldn't find anything within a 10-block radius of the school. By the time I actually reached the building, I was late, drenched and totally exasperated. I missed the first two appointments. My son, in his wisdom, had scheduled them five minutes apart. Even if I had been on time for the first interview, I would have been late for the second without a turbo-jet to propel me to the other end of the school on time.

I have since learned to take these parent-teacher days in stride. After all, how much can you get out of five minutes? I find that after running up a flight of stairs or two, I am usually so winded that I spend the first minute just catching my breath and checking my pulse.

And then the teacher has to figure out who my child is. High school teachers have multiple classes, so they don't necessarily know their students by name. They often have to search their class lists to find the child before they can give you any information. By the time you get down to business, the next parent is already knocking on the door.

It's a far cry from elementary school, when the teachers were so accessible. They knew you and your child, and there was no stigma if a mom or dad showed up after school for an impromptu chat with the teacher. (Parents: don't try this in high school if you want to stay on speaking terms with your teen.) Back in the good old days of elementary school, parent-teacher conferences would run at least 15 minutes, so there was actually time to have a meaningful exchange.

But at the high-school level, we parents glean what we can from morsels of information doled out to us by teachers who barely know our kids. And we willingly risk health and sanity for these tête-à-têtes that are more form than content, because that's the only contact we have with the school.

With winter term meetings just around the corner, I've started increasing my aerobic workouts. I actually feel quite confident about this academic year. It's next year that I'm worried about. I'll have to run a marathon or two to prepare for the ultimate test of endurance: two sets of interviews when son number 2 starts high school.

Campus hate laws are a shield, not a sword

By ED MORGAN
Special to The CJN

"Call the police if you're concerned," the university administrator says. "We have hate laws in this country."

A variation on that statement has been repeated to me at least half a dozen times during the past several years. Ever since an anti-Israel riot caused former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu to cancel a planned speech at Concordia University in the fall of 2002, concern to keep debate on campus open and civil has been high on the Jewish community's agenda. Ironically, the hate propaganda laws that Canadian Jewish organizations have traditionally supported as a solution to racist and anti-Semitic speech have surfaced as the primary vehicle for protecting the most prevalent and offensive forms of on-campus propaganda.

The Supreme Court of Canada set out the requirements for a successful hate prosecution in the 1989 case of Alberta teacher James Keegstra, who taught his high school students that a Jewish conspiracy was taking over the world. One can understand the Court's concern to put the test as high as possible – after all, it is not lightly that a liberal society seeks to incarcerate people for what they have said, not what they have done. The criminalization of mere words – wherever they are spoken or published – goes against the grain of a society that has free speech as one of its foundational principles.

Accordingly, the Supreme Court argued that in order to qualify as criminal speech, hate-mongering must go beyond political polemics of even the nastiest kind and enter the realm of "emotions that belie rationality." It is not enough to convey gross misinformation, or to question a people's right to exist, or to ask rhetorically, Did six million really die? as Ernst Zundel did in the notorious pamphlet for which he was acquitted. Rather, the hate-mongering must be entirely devoid of rational content, appealing to the listener's or the reader's passions rather than to his or her (perhaps sinister) mind. It is, to put it mildly, a tough case for prosecutors to make.

It is with this background in mind that we turn to current campus debates on the Middle East, where there is no shortage of speakers who present messages that are disquieting for Jewish students. For example, controversial author Norman Finkelstein, who wrote the book The Holocaust Industry, has recently given speeches in such places as University of Toronto, University of Waterloo, McMaster University and Dalhousie University, to name a few. Likewise, visiting professor Aijaz Ahmad, author of The Nazification of Israel, spent several semesters deriding the Jewish state from the platform of York University's department of sociology. All of this, from the viewpoint of many, is highly distasteful. None of it, from the viewpoint of the law, is criminal.

That said, the current state of the law is as it should be. It is not only Israel's critics, but also its greatest defenders, that support the broadest possible protection for freedom of speech. Alan Dershowitz, author of The Case for Israel, made his mark early in his career by going on speaking tours with Penthouse magazine publisher Bob Guccione, arguing that the publishing industry is the ultimate "marketplace of ideas" and that under the U.S. First Amendment, virtually anything goes, from extremist politics to skin magazines. Everyone from Mussolini to Mao is, or should be, free to speak their mind.

The real question is not what people can say, but where and when they can say it. The Ontario Court of Appeal has upheld strip shows and lap dancing as free expression. However, no one suggests that the "Canadian ballet" be performed in a football stadium at half time or on nationally broadcast TV. Likewise, as schoolteachers everywhere from Moncton to Peel Region have learned, standing at the head of a classroom brings restrictions that have more to do with professionalism and the nurturing of young minds than they do with the criminal law. You can lose your job for saying things for which you can't lose your liberty.

> The society at large belongs to all speakers. The university belongs to a community of listeners.

All of which brings us back to campus. Every university faculty member knows it is the school's human rights policy, academic code of conduct and sexual harassment rules that set realistic limits on behaviour, not the federal Criminal Code. Ethnic jokes, catcalls to women, racist platforms, anti-French or anti-English or anti-immigrant or anti-Native tirades may not cause anyone to serve hard time, but they may be the platter on which lecturers and others serve up their careers. The society at large belongs to all speakers. The university belongs to a community of listeners.

The test for campus speech, therefore, is not the one set out in the Keegstra case. It is no answer to a complaint lodged against a campus speaker to say that those offended should call the police. To do so is to potentially use the hate laws as a shield for racism and sexism rather than as a sword striking at the heart of these pernicious dogmas.

Needless to say, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict should be debated in the halls of the university, as should Quebec sovereignty, women's empowerment and self-government for aboriginal groups. On the other hand, imagine a professor imposing on francophone students The Nazification of Quebec or a guest speaker accusing feminists of creating a "misogyny industry" or a conference questioning the right of First Nations to exist. The campus belongs to everyone who attends university, and it is up to the administration – not the police – to keep it that way.

CJN Roundtable addresses value of Jewish education

By FRANCES KRAFT and ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporters

Affordability is not the main issue in day school education, according to Rabbi Joshua Elkin, a Boston-based Jewish education expert.

"If you have a place that's outstanding, people are going to come to it," said the rabbi, who headed the Solomon Schechter Day School of Greater Boston for 20 years before becoming executive director of the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE).

Rabbi Elkin spoke on a December panel at the law offices of Goodman and Carr, sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News as part of its annual Roundtable series. Along with co-panelists Alex Pomson, chair of Jewish Teacher Education at York University, and Seymour Epstein, executive director of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE), Rabbi Elkin addressed a select group of 18 Jewish educators and lay leaders about "The Future of Jewish Education."

According to Pomson, the challenge facing educators is not necessarily "reducing the bill" but persuading people that Jewish education is worth the cost. Pomson reminded the group that in previous generations, parents chose to send their children to Jewish schools even when they were economically challenged.

Over the last 10 years, Pomson said "the total proportion of children attending Jewish day schools has plateaued" and has in fact probably been decreasing.

This may not be due to cost, but rather to changing demographics, Pomson said. In the past, Toronto "benefited from a Montreal exodus… and a post-Holocaust generation committed to Jewish education," which masked the fact that more Jewish families were choosing other types of private and public schools.

Now, attention should be paid to offering diversified learning environments so that parents and children can choose between different educational experiences. Two or three smaller schools could be offered within the framework of one umbrella institution, he suggested.

Teaching Hebrew well and making Israel relevant to students in Jewish day schools is another challenge that needs to be addressed, Pomson said.

He also pointed out that the diversity of the Toronto community is implicit in the fact that the majority of children in our city attend non-Orthodox community day schools, while south of the border, the vast majority of children attend Orthodox, if not haredi, schools.

Epstein emphasized the importance of reaching out into the Russian and Hebrew-speaking sectors, as well as into what he calls the "middle income, mildly affiliated" parts of the community.

He estimated that more than 75 per cent of the Jewish community "has nothing to do with Jewish life.

"We have to find ways to service those communities and make available to them zones in which they feel comfortable," Epstein said.

People don't ask whether they can afford to do without day school education, said Rabbi Elkin. One of the reasons the Jewish community of Toronto is so vibrant, he said, is because of its strong history of Jewish day school education.

To illustrate his point about the implications of forgoing a Jewish education, the rabbi cited a story told by philanthropist Michael Steinhardt about the lack of Jewish literacy among some Birthright Israel participants in the United States.

When the program – for which Steinhardt was a founder and major funder – was launched five years ago, a letter sent to potential participants around the time of Rosh Hashanah concluded with the words "Shanah Tovah," wishing recipients a happy New Year.

A "not insignificant number of replies" (Steinhardt has said it was dozens) to that letter began with the words "Dear Shanah," or "Dear Ms. Tovah," Rabbi Elkin said.

In addition to Jewish literacy, day schools also build a sense of community, he added.

Rabbi Elkin recommended that schools "get very focused on what educational excellence is… I would submit that Jewish day school education in North America is one of the best values people can find. You get two educations [Jewish and secular] under one roof."

The heritage taught at Jewish day schools includes values, wisdom, purpose and guidance in life, he noted.

A strong "vision" – the element he feels is currently most lacking in North American day schools – combined with strong lay and professional leadership, adds up to a strong institution, Rabbi Elkin said.

Although historically Jewish education was free, Rabbi Elkin said he is not suggesting free education as a serious proposal.

He did suggest that every day school embrace the notion of an annual campaign, co-ordinated in the community with the annual UJA campaign.

Also, he said, the role of grandparents "needs to be brought out more directly." According to a recent survey by the American Association of Retired People (AARP), 52 per cent of respondents pay for their grandchildren's education, he said, noting that the situation in Canada may be different. "A lot is college, but a lot is not."

The Jewish community needs to explore things such as private funding and how to administer day school subsidies respectfully and with dignity, Rabbi Elkin said.

Funding for tuition subsidies in Toronto grew from $6.9 million to $7.8 million over the past year, said Epstein. Tuition fees, he noted, are dictated in large part by staff salaries, which account for the largest part of school budgets.

As part of the roundtable discussion, Paul Shaviv, headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), noted that a parent with three children at his school has annual tuition fees of $30,000 to $40,000. "It's a huge, huge amount of money."

Even to committed parents, cost is often "an effective barrier," said Berl Nadler, president of Ulpanat Orot and Yeshivat Or Chaim.

Shaviv said that schools now have "a whole different area of responsibility, because for many families schools have replaced the synagogue as the "major institution of Jewish connection." Sometimes, for example, parents call CHAT because they need to speak to a rabbi, he said.

Creative approaches needed for outreach and fundraising

Pomson added that it is important to find ways for parents to feel "needed and [like] serious participants." He mentioned adult education and board membership as examples.

The issue of supplementary schools was raised by Alan Shefman, a York region public school trustee and supplementary school parent. "We desperately need to think how to provide [the supplementary school system] as an attractive system."

Among other issues raised in the discussion, Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, CJN editorial advisory board member and spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah, noted that "it would seem that the greater the religious commitment, the greater the commitment to Jewish education, so I think a broader theme in the whole discussion is to address religious commitment."

Alan Shefman

Igor Korenzvit, chair of the board of governors of the Russian Jewish Community Centre and a CJN editorial advisory board member, added that children from the Russian Jewish community constitute less than five per cent of the Jewish day school population, even though that community constitutes up to 40,000 people out of an estimated 180,000 in the greater Toronto Jewish community.

Berl Nadler

"For them, it's more than essential," he said, because some do not have any other connection to Jewish life.

Syd Eisen, who was founding director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies and is a life member of the board of CHAT, noted that very few points in these types of discussions are followed up. He is convinced, he said, that schools are not always given the reason when students are pulled out of day schools.

Also, he said, school boards are "not always made up of" people who understand why people leave for financial reasons.

Zita Gardner, director of Leo Baeck Day School, said that when her school tried to raise money a few years ago for an addition, they found it difficult because the perception, which she said is not true, was that "day school education in the non-Orthodox community was for the well-to-do."

CJN president and former UJA Federation board member Donald Carr noted that Toronto has a unique source of funding, Pardes Shalom Cemetery, which in the future is expected to produce "millions of dollars over a period of time for the benefit of this community," and some of that could go to Jewish education.

Sandy Brown, a CJN editorial advisory board member and a past president of the federation and the BJE, said the federation "has to be much more aggressive with our major donors." With major university buildings bearing names of Jewish donors, she believes that the proportion of giving to the general community versus giving to the Jewish community may have to be reversed.

Paul Shaviv

"Have we been able to send the message about the positiveness of our Jewish community?"

Day school tuition puts pressure on parents

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Over the past three years, tuition at some Jewish day schools has gone up close to 40 per cent, and some parents are saying the latest increases are bringing them close to their breaking points.

The CJN spoke to three day school parents about the cost of Jewish education: lawyers Claire Glowinsky and David Brooker, and dental hygienist Robyn Solomons. They send their children to Associated Hebrew Schools, United Synagogue Day School and Leo Baeck Day School, respectively. Brooker and Solomons have two children in the system this year, while Glowinsky has three kids attending Jewish day school. Next year, Brooker will add his third child, and Glowinsky her fourth, to Jewish day school rosters.

Glowinsky attended Jewish day school until Grade 4. The other two never attended day schools. The three parents are committed to Jewish education for their children, but say that many of their friends have decided to opt out of day schools and into neighbourhood public schools.

"At a certain point, it becomes really uncomfortable to send two or three children to Jewish day school. You don't hear parents say 'I'll sleep on the streets as long as my children can go to Jewish day schools' anymore," Glowinsky said.

Glowinsky said many of her friends are saying they feel comfortable sending their children to a public school full of Jewish kids.

"They say you get off Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. And the schools have a real Jewish feeling.

"I don't buy into that," Glowinsky said.

Many parents are angry at a discriminatory system that allows for publicly supported Catholic education, but doesn't help other religious groups, Solomons said.

Some parents are also angry at their schools for having raised tuition just as the provincial government implemented the (now cancelled) private school tax credits.

While some schools maintain that tuitions were raised to cover unexpected costs that arose from declining enrolment, Brooker said that parking lot scuttlebutt accused school administrators of a cash-grab just when families were benefiting from a tax break.

In either case, with the recent cancellation of the private school tax credit by the Liberal government, what started out as a public relations nightmare for the schools could turn into lower enrolments. When less children enrol, the schools need to charge higher tuitions to cover their costs.

Rising costs affect schools and parents

The cycle leaves parents uncertain of how high tuition will go, and some are choosing not to begin the process because of the uncertainty of being able to afford to send all their children to Jewish day school. "They don't want to send the oldest child and not their younger ones," Glowinsky said.

It's a problem for both parents and schools.

"Parents don't realize how much the schools are struggling to find the dollars and cents," she said, adding that UJA Federation "could really make a difference by committing itself to help families through additional funding to the schools."

At an estimated $10,000 per year per child, day school tuition really begins to hurt middle income parents.

"People at the low [income] end will qualify for a subsidy. People at the higher end will pay for the school. But the people in the middle, who maybe wouldn't qualify for a subsidy because their incomes are too high, they're the ones who are feeling increasingly uncomfortable," Glowinsky said.

"We choose Jewish education first and if there is money left over for other things, that's fine."

However, others are deciding not to send their children to Jewish day schools so they can move into bigger houses, take winter holidays in the Caribbean or afford sleepover camps, she said.

Of course, many parents do decide to stay with Jewish schools.

Some decide to have smaller families so they can provide all their children with Jewish education, Solomons said.

Those who do stay often "go into debt" to pay tuition, Brooker said.

"Some people are really choking," said Glowinsky.

But Brooker said most of his friends would never consider asking for a subsidy. "They would rather leave," he said, adding that although he has never applied for a subsidy, he's heard the process is very complicated.

Brooker and Solomons said they've also heard it's invasive and that schools involve grandparents in the application process.

They're not prepared to ask parents or in-laws for help in that way. "It's one thing if parents offer to help. It's another if the school imposes it on them," Brooker said.

Solomons said she would never apply for a subsidy because there are people much more needy than her.

For the time being, the three parents are committed to Jewish education.

"I look at my children in synagogue and I see they actually know what's going on," Glowinsky said.

"They wouldn't get that in a public school."

Facing the Funding Challenge

By RABBI IRWIN E. WITTY

The June 12, 2003 issue of The Canadian Jewish News carried a story under the headline "Tuition hikes prompt calls to withhold payments." It described the formation of a new Toronto day school parents group advocating a form of civil disobedience when it came to paying tuition fees for the 2003-2004 school term.

The newly organized Jewish School Parents Association has advised its constituents not to comply with the payment of tuition fees, some of which present a 12.5 per cent increase over those which were levied during the 2002-2003 academic year. Translated into dollars (Canadian currency), the payments expected for the forthcoming year will be $8,950 at the Associated Hebrew Day School (up from $7,950), $9,950 at the United Synagogue Day School (up from $8,950), $9,100 at the Eitz Chaim Day Schools (up from $8,600), and $8,300 at the Leo Baeck Day School (up from $7,600 and not including a building fund surcharge of $633).

The Jewish School Parents Association advocates a variety of tactics for their members to embrace in order to compel schools to freeze tuition costs next year and have them reduced in subsequent years. One immediate strategy, which the association is advising parents to follow, is to remit payment to schools of an amount equal only to last year's tuition fee, without regard to any requested increase.

The fear heard in some quarters with regard to the current round of increases is that large numbers of children will be removed from day schools. One mother is quoted in the newspaper as saying, "You have to be wealthy to afford a Jewish education... It's not just this particular increase. What about next year and the year after?"

In truth, Toronto's UJA-Federation provides millions of dollars annually to day schools that meet the funding criteria of its Board of Jewish Education for tuition fee subsidies. These subsidies are distributed to qualifying schools based upon the needs of individual families within the institution's parent population. Despite a recent large increase in community funding, the escalating costs of operating day schools make it almost impossible to provide all the finances that are needed to bridge the gap between the income realized from fees that parents pay and the actual per capita cost of operating an institution.

What is reported with regard to Toronto holds true in dozens of other communities in which the struggle to keep day schools is at the top of the Jewish educational agenda. A recent column in the New York Jewish Week speaks of schools now reaching, or exceeding, day school tuition fees of $14,000.

The fact is that a vast number of day school parents do not pay the per student cost, even where such costs are reflected fully in the per capita fee. This is a reality even for financially "comfortable" families because if they have two, three or four children in school, they are likely to receive tuition fee remissions for every sibling beyond the first child enrolled. Such remissions, which are understandable, reduce the per child income to the school to an amount that is often below the per capita cost.

> Middle class parents find it hard to pay for day school education

In a growing number of cities, local federations, recognizing the value of maintaining viable day schools and the Jewish education programs they provide, offer grants, subsidies or scholarship aid to their local day schools. But all over the continent, one senses that the identical picture is emerging, namely, that those who can afford to have their children attend a day school are the very wealthy (because they have no need for tuition assistance) or the very poor (because they can count, invariably, on scholarship aid).

The vast numbers of middle class parents of varying ideological persuasions, who constitute the key group within the Jewish community from among whom day schools recruit students, are finding it increasingly problematic to pay for the day school education of their children, even if they are prepared to make, and are already making, serious financial sacrifices. There are, after all, limits to the number of raffles, bazaars, golf tournaments, bingos, teas, rummage sales, testimonial dinners, concerts, etc., that can be mounted with success. Each of these fundraising operations requires an inordinate investment of time, manpower and energy, and even when these can be marshalled, it is the same donors to whom schools turn for repeated contributions to the various fundraising initiatives. Considering that the same givers are expected to provide financial help to more than one Jewish community institution, it is little wonder that one hears repeatedly about "donor fatigue."

While there is government funding (at least to a degree) in some Canadian provinces and various countries (England, South Africa, Holland, et al.) that assists all private schools including Jewish day schools, the burden of maintaining Jewish day schools in the United States, in those Canadian provinces that do not provide funding support to independent schools and in other countries, constitutes a true and unrelenting challenge.

While it is accepted that the primary obligation for day school tuition fees is that of parents, the responsibility for maintaining such schools must be shared by the community at large. And if this is true for the present, it is becoming increasingly clear that it will be all the more so in the foreseeable future.

What, then, can be done to manage what is already an intimidating community problem and a looming crisis?

The answer lies, in the first instance, in three unconventional and, for many, unpalatable solutions.

The first is mobilizing, where and when possible, grandparents of day school children to assist in funding the tuition payments of their granchildren. While this may not be accepted universally, and may not be applicable in schools with a high percentage of youngsters from homes that are economically challenged, some of our schools may find this an idea that can translate into sizable sums of heretofore untapped income.

The second is to approach parents with financial resources, whose children (for whom they paid full tuition fees) have graduated from day school, to agree to continue paying the tuition (in whole or in part) of a needy child. This might extend for a period of one year up to the entire time that the youngster remains enrolled in the school. Properly marketed, there is the prospect of finding in such an undertaking additional "new" dollars for a school's budget.

A third approach is one which has been suggested many times, insofar as I am aware, but has been resisted by many community leaders. It involves striking a deal with the continent-wide UJA and federations to have a percentage of all campaign funds earmarked for the support of Jewish day school education. The necessary funds would be withheld by local UJA campaign offices and then distributed on a per capita basis to all day schools in the community; or alternatively, the funds could be used to establish an independent trust for the benefit of day school education. The monies in this account would be distributed to day schools based upon the needs of individual institutions. A proper formula for the equitable distribution of these dollars can be devised without too much difficulty. The administrative costs involved might be absorbed by local federations or underwritten by one or several philanthropic foundations.

To be sure, there will be many who will argue that the last proposal means, in effect, that Israel would be underwriting Diaspora Jewish education and that many Jews who have no children in day schools, or are (even at this late date) opposed to day school education, will be contributing to the day school education of others' children.

One should not minimize either of these contentions. But these arguments can be met readily enough: Israel's contribution to meeting the steadily rising costs of intensive Jewish education is, if one takes the "long view" of such matters, insurance against the further erosion of Jewish identity among western Jews and the accompanying alienation of Jews from the support of the Jewish state as well as from an appreciation of its language, people, and culture.

As for the fact that Jews will be "taxed" with having to pay the cost of day schools, even though they may have no use for them for their own child, surely this is no different from allocating community funds for family agencies of which many of us make no use, old folks homes for which most of us have no need, or campus organizations to which neither we nor our children belong.

There is also one more possible "solution:" the establishment of a continent-wide foundation for Jewish education. This project, advocated at different times during the past several decades by various individuals (most recently by George Hanus of Chicago and Joseph Berman of Toronto), calls for having individuals with significant financial means designate in their bequests a percentage of their capital for a fund that would be dedicated to meeting the needs of Jewish day schools.

Regardless of the strategy that will be embraced to meet a widespread and growing need, it must be clear by now that the time has arrived to devise a continental approach to deal with the challenge we confront. We may have waited too long already. Jewish educators of all persuasions should exploit their contacts with Jewish community leaders to urge that they address this subject without delay. Indeed, there should be an organized lobby of Jewish educators and laymen committed to assuring the continued existence of day schools who will treat this issue as the truly vital concern that it is.

Students don't need to anguish over academic or applied stream

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As Grade 8 students prepare themselves for high school, Ontario's new curriculum has them deciding whether they plan on pursuing the academic or applied stream.

Students and their parents often anguish over the decision, because they fear that by choosing applied subjects, which are prerequisites for college, they are narrowing their educational options.

But several Toronto educators agree that students are not necessarily locked into their decision.

According to a press release issued by the Ontario government, streaming in Grade 9 has been designed so that the courses students take will prepare them for either Grade 10 stream. Grade 9 students will be able to move to the other stream in Grade 10 if they choose.

While students need to consider that there are Grade 10 prerequisites for certain Grade 11 classes, transfer courses are available for those in grades 10, 11 and 12 who want to change streams.

If requirements for university and college are the same for a particular subject, then a joint university/college course is offered.

Joy Koplowitz, senior psycho-educational consultant at Jewish Vocational Services of Metropolitan Toronto, says both academic and applied streams teach theoretical and concrete issues, but applied subjects are less complex and the pace of learning is somewhat slower.

When students have trouble keeping up with the pace of an academic subject, she says, it is likely they will be unable to keep up at university.

"Certain university programs, such as business, for example, insist that students have academic math. If students take applied math, though, that does not mean they cannot go to university. There are a number of university programs that do not require math."

If a student who has taken applied math wants to change streams, there are bridge courses available that will enable them to upgrade, Koplowitz says. "School guidance counsellors should be able to advise them about this."

Rabbi Chaim Sacknovitz, guidance counsellor at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), says by offering different streams of learning, schools are recognizing that students have different strengths and weaknesses.

"They take applied subjects so that they are challenged, but not overly so. We emphasize to students that they can take one applied subject and several academic subjects. We want them to concentrate on their strengths."

Many high schools, including CHAT, offer enriched courses for students who want a greater challenge, he says.

"These courses are not ministry defined and universities do not look at them any differently than academic courses, but many students enjoy the challenge of learning."

As a vice-principal within the Toronto District School Board, Frieda Woznica says she advises parents and teachers to look at students' learning styles before choosing the academic or applied stream.

"If a student needs to learn through concrete examples, than that student should be taking the applied subject. It is far better to put a student at their appropriate level rather than have them struggle.

"There is always an alternate path available. A student can take Grade 9 applied and move on to Grade 10 academic. Alternatively, there are transfer courses for those in higher grades."

Taking a course that is appropriate for them could build their confidence in the subject, Woznica says.

Naomi Stern, parent of a Grade 11 student in a Thornhill public high school, says her daughter thrived academically after she decided to take applied math.

"Her struggle in math spilled over to all her subjects. When math became easier for her, she felt better all around. We studied the university course requirements at several schools and discovered she is only slightly limited because she is lacking her academic math. I feel she made the best decision."

For students who plan to enter the workplace or take a training program after high school, workplace courses are also available in many public high schools. These classes focus on employment skills and on the practical workplace applications of a specific subject.

Live & Learn

Helping boys: Understanding their learning styles improves academic performance

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Years ago, professions such as law and medicine were overwhelmingly male-dominated. These days, female professionals are common, and law school and medical school enrolment figures show the gender gap is closing.

Moreover, a Statistics Canada report released last summer based on 2001 data indicates that women account for 57 per cent of all full-time university students. And the Ottawa Citizen recently cited figures from fall 2001 that showed there were 75,000 more women than men enrolled in full-time, university-level programs in Canada.

While all this may be good news for girls, it has many educators concerned about boys' scholastic performance.

Bob Milne, principal of Northern Secondary School, a public high school in mid-town Toronto, says that while his school doesn't keep statistics on gender performance, anecdotal evidence suggests girls are getting higher marks than boys, who are over-represented in special education classes.

Indeed, recent educational studies of high-school age students show girls are out-performing boys. A study comparing 16-year-old boys and girls by the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada, in 2003 found girls are achieving 17 per cent higher scores in reading and writing. The same study showed the gender gap that once existed in math and science has also disappeared.

Judy Libman of Ambitions Educational Consulting counsels high school students preparing for university and university students who need help evaluating their educational goals. She stresses that while every student is unique, she has noticed some basic academic differences between boys and girls.

For example, she says girls tend to be better readers and have more curiosity about the world around them. "In general, girls have an interest in learning outside the classroom."

On the other hand, boys tend to do little recreational reading. "They don't even read the newspaper. They think the classroom is the only place they're supposed to be reading."

In their free time, Libman says, boys tend to be involved in recreational activities such as sports, or music and computer games, rather than activities that encourage them to engage with the world around them.

She says their limited interest in reading affects their writing skills. "There's no template for writing: 98 per cent of writing is reading and reading good writing."

As well, boys often have weaker organizational skills. "With girls, you give them some suggestions and they're writing them down. But it's not quite the same with boys. I say, 'Aren't you going to write it down?' Boys will say, 'I'll remember it.' Then I hand them a pencil."

Libman adds that boys don't like to admit they need help because they value self-sufficiency, while girls are more likely to ask for help if they need it.

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), says the difference in organizational skills is most pronounced in the early teen years, because most girls are more mature at that age. "More 14-year-old boys need organizational help than 14-year-old girls, but it straightens out in the later grades."

Libman offers strategies for helping boys improve their academic performance. Boys often don't know how to study, she says. Rather than memorize, they need to become active learners in order to understand the material. "The best way is to find a study partner and challenge each other."

She also stresses the importance of reading, particularly to improve boys' writing and communication skills.

"When you say to them it's not about spending more time studying, it's about using your time more strategically, they respond," she says. "When you give them an action plan, the boys pick up on it… When they develop a feeling of mastery, they begin to enjoy learning."

Vaad bans OU-certified matzah for Montreal food producers

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Vaad Ha'ir has broken with longstanding practice and told kosher food manufacturers and caterers under its supervision they may no longer use machine-made matzah or matzah products from the United States to make their own Passover products.

In a letter dated Feb. 10 obtained by The CJN, Vaad executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel says that effective immediately, the only products it approves are those "18-minute matzahs" with a hechsher it finds acceptable. He states that "no U.S. machine matzah currently in production meets this requirement."

Well-known brands affected

The products the Vaad approves, such as cake meal and farfel, must have been made using the 18-minute rule – that is, stopping production every 18 minutes and thoroughly cleaning equipment so as not give the matzah time to ferment and become chometz because of contact with water.

The notable certification that the Vaad no longer recognizes belongs to the New York-based Orthodox Union, which issues the internationally recognized OU. The OU, which speaks for some 1,000 North American Orthodox congregations, certifies many of the best-known kosher brands on the market, including Manischewitz, Goodman's and Horowitz Margareten.

MP stands by 'concentration camp' remark

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Representatives of the Jewish community are disappointed that their meeting with Liberal MP Pat O'Brien failed to sway the parliamentarian from his view that Israel is turning the West Bank and Gaza into giant "concentration camps."

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, and Jacob Peretz, chair of community relations for the London Jewish Federation, said their one-hour meeting with O'Brien went poorly. Both were scathing in their criticism of O'Brien, with Peretz saying "I've seen a lot of people say things [when] they don't know what they're talking about," while in a letter to O'Brien, Adler said one of the MP's arguments justifying his use of the term was "breathtaking in its foolishness."

Leo Adler MP Pat O'Brien

Adler said he and four representatives of the London Jewish community met with O'Brien to sensitize him to the inflammatory nature of the term "concentration camp." That kind of language is "hurtful" to the Jewish community, he said.

"His right to agree or disagree with the wall is not in dispute. He's entitled to his opinion, but there's no necessity for that language. He said he deliberately used it. He knew it would raise flak. He knew others had used it."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Accused in Court

TORONTO — Christopher Steven McBride, accused of first degree murder in the July 2002 killing of David Rosenzweig, is to appear in court this month for a procedural remand. He will then go back to jail until his next appearance. A trial date is not expected to be set for at least a few weeks. Rosenzweig, an observant Jew, was stabbed while helping his son with a flat tire at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue.

More Flights to Israel

TORONTO — Air Canada is planning daily service from Toronto to Israel starting June 1, an airline official said last month during a short stop in Israel. The airline, the only scheduled carrier beside El Al flying between Canada and Israel, now offers four flights a week. In the past, it has increased flights to meet demand.

Cineplex Creator Dies

TORONTO — Nat Taylor, the creator of the world's first multi-screen movie theatre in Ottawa in 1948 who later owned a theatre chain, film studio and movie distribution firm, died last week of natural causes at 98. Taylor and Garth Drabinsky also opened the 18-screen Cineplex complex in Toronto's Eaton Centre in 1979. It later became a national chain.

WORLD

A Jewish Russian PM?

MOSCOW — Russian President Vladimir Putin last week named little-known Jewish politician Mikhail Fradkov as prime minister. Fradkov, Russia's envoy to the European Union, is an unknown figure in Russian politics. Putin fired his entire cabinet last month, just weeks ahead of Russia's March 14 vote. Fradkov needs to be endorsed by the Russian Parliament, but the pro-Putin majority there was expected to back him in a vote last week. Russian Jewish leaders said he has had no interaction with the organized Jewish community.

Citizenship Stripped

ST. LOUIS — A retired clothing worker from St. Louis has been stripped of his U.S. citizenship for serving as an armed SS guard at three Nazi concentration camps. A federal court judge found Romanian-born Adam Friedrich, 82, volunteered for duty in the SS and in January 1943 was a guard at Gross-Rosen concentration camp. In August 1943, he was transferred to Dyhernfurth, a sub-camp of Gross-Rosen and later guarded inmates who were taken to the Flossenburg concentration camp.

Papon Appeal Allowed

PARIS — Maurice Papon will be allowed to appeal his 10-year jail sentence, but his demand for a retrial has been rejected. A court in Paris said last month that Papon, a convicted war criminal, could appeal his 1998 conviction for complicity in crimes against humanity for his role in deporting 1,500 Jews to Auschwitz when he was a senior Vichy official in southwest France during World War II. The court called a French law denying Papon an appeal unjust, but rejected a demand by his lawyers for a retrial. The nonagenarian, who served as a cabinet minister in postwar French governments, was released from a Paris prison in September 2002 for health reasons, but may still go back to jail if his health improves.

Help for Haiti

NEW YORK — The American Jewish World Service, a Jewish relief agency, is collecting money for humanitarian aid in war-torn Haiti. Donations can be sent to AJWS, Haiti Relief, 45 W. 36th St., 10th Floor, New York, NY, 10018, or made online at www.ajws.org.

Kerry Shoah Revelation

NEW YORK — Some of U.S. Senator John Kerry's relatives were killed in the Holocaust. The Jewish-born grandfather of the Democratic presidential hopeful lost a sister in Treblinka and a brother in the Czech ghetto of Terezin, Newsday reported. Last year, the Massachusetts Democrat learned his paternal grandfather, Frederick Kerry, who immigrated to America from the Austro-Hungarian Empire, was born Fritz Kohn and later converted to Catholicism. The news that family members died in the Holocaust "gives an even greater personal sense of connection" to the Holocaust "that is very real and very touching," Kerry said.

New Jewish Museum

COPENHAGEN — A museum paying tribute to Danish Jewry is set to open in Copenhagen June 8. The foundation of the late Danish pianist and satirist Victor Borge has donated $250,000 (US) toward the museum, designed by U.S. architect Daniel Libeskind and funded by the Danish Ministry of Culture and private foundations. The Danish-born Borge, a Jew, fled to New York in 1940 when Denmark was occupied by the Nazis.

Group's Assets Frozen

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Supreme Court kept frozen the assets of a charity the Treasury Department says is linked to Hamas. The Richardson, Texas-based Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development had its assets frozen in December 2001 for allegedly funnelling millions of dollars to Hamas, a U.S.-government designated terror group. Lower courts had ruled its due process rights had not been violated, and the high court rejected its appeal without comment.

Justice Department names alleged war criminal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

83-year-old St. Catharines man faces loss of citizenship

An 83-year-old St. Catharines man is facing loss of citizenship for allegedly lying about his wartime service as an armed SS guard at three Nazi concentration camps.

Justice Department lawyers filed court documents last week alleging Jura Skomatchuk was recruited from the region of Stanislav, then in Nazi-occupied Poland but today part of Ukraine, to serve as an SS Wachmann (guard) at the Trawniki training camp.

Skomatchuk was part of a group of recruits who were sent to Trawniki, near the city of Lublin, in late March or early April 1943. Following a period of basic training, he allegedly guarded Jewish internees at the Poniatowa forced labour camp near Trawniki. SS guards there "had standing orders to shoot any prisoner attempting to escape," court documents state.

"The primary role of Trawniki guards was to assist the SS and police in carrying out 'Operation Reinhard' [the plan to kill Poland's Jews] in 1942-43. In that regard, Trawniki guards took part in more than 200 anti-Jewish operations, including ghetto clearings and mass shootings in the Lublin district during 1942-43. In addition, the Trawniki guards were used as escort on deportation transports, guard detachments at 'Operation Reinhard' killing centres, and security details during the confiscation and registration of Jewish property and valuables. The participation of the Trawniki guards in the extermination of the Jewish population of the General Government [of Poland] continued until November 1943," the documents state.

Skomatchuk's service coincided with the "Harvest Festival" massacre of thousands of Jews, part of Operation Reinhard, which lasted until November 1943. The killing spree was launched that October after Jewish inmates at the Sobibor death camp attempted a revolt.

"During the so-called 'Harvest Festival' massacres, the 40,000 Jewish inmates of the labour camps at Poniatowa, Majdanek and Trawniki were executed. While the role of the Trawniki guards in the actual executions is subject to historical debates, these guards are known to have participated in the 'clean-up' operations thereafter," the documents say.

After the Harvest Festival, which marked the end of Operation Reinhard, Skomatchuk was transferred to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp near Berlin, where he served as an armed guard. Later, he was transferred to the Mauthausen concentration camp in Austria, and its satellite camp, Gusen, where he served until the end of the war, the documents allege.

At the conclusion of hostilities, Skomatchuk worked as a farm labourer before moving to Britain. In 1952, he was granted a Canadian visa and in May of that year, he arrived in Quebec City as a permanent resident.

The court documents allege Skomatchuk did not disclose his wartime service to Canadian authorities. As a member of the SS, he would have been ineligible to enter Canada, the documents say.

Skomatchuk obtained citizenship in 1957, but the documents also claim he would never have been granted that privilege had his wartime service been known.

Terry Beitner, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said "the government is pleased to begin this action as a demonstration of its resolve." A second, unnamed individual is also facing loss of citizenship, but that person has not yet been served with legal documents, he added.

With the Skomatchuk case, the number of Nazi-era war crimes proceedings rises to 21.

Tourism in Israel (2)

From the editor's desk

Last month, in Jerusalem, The CJN joined a foreign delegation of more than 600 travel industry officials and tour operators who participated in the Third Prime Minister's Conference for Tourism to Israel.

The conference began on Sunday night and lasted through Tuesday. It coincided with Tourism Week 2004, whose centrepiece event was the opening of the 10th International Mediterranean Tourism Market (IMTM), an exposition that showcases tourism centres throughout the Mediterranean basin – although some of the places displayed ranged as far as Thailand as well – in a specially designed convention and trade exposition grounds in north Tel Aviv.

Some 26 different countries were represented at the exhibition. And according to Francesco Frangialli, the secretary general of the World Tourism Organization, their participation was an inherently positive, bold statement about their faith in the future.

"Tourism is a harbinger of peace," the former French government tourism official said with specific reference to the troubled Middle East. "Direct contact between individuals is irreplaceable in forging human relations.

"Moreover," he added, "this is a small region, and thus the [trade and commercial] interests of the countries here are essentially the same.

"The day will surely come," Frangialli told us with unquestioned confidence, "when tourism and peace will resume their march forward."

Michael Federman, chair of the Federation of Israeli Tourism Organizations was less "messianic" in his message to us. He was both pointed and poignant.

"You were invited to this conference to join us in a major effort to bring Israeli tourism back as soon as possible to where it was in 2000."

By the end of September 2000, just before the launch of the terrorist war against Israel, nearly 2.7 million tourists had visited the Jewish state.

The violence brought a virtual end to tourism for that year. In 2002, merely 800,000 tourists visited Israel. In 2003, the number reached almost 1.1 million. (It is interesting to note that no tourism figures were distributed for the year 2001. It is not unreasonable to conclude, therefore, that the number of tourists that year was smaller in number than even the paltry 800,000 figure.)

"We know that this [bringing Israeli tourism back to where it was in 2000] cannot be done within a short period of time," Federman said, "but we believe that with a concentrated and well co-ordinated effort, we can reach the second million in the near future."

Federman had told the audience at the opening ceremonies, after he joyfully welcomed a tourism delegation from Jordan, that Israel realistically hopes to receive between 1.3 and 1.5 million tourists in 2004.

"We count on you to help us achieve this goal and we promise you to remember in better times those who stood by us and helped us in the more difficult times."

Federman repeated the latter message, in various iterations, a number of times throughout the three-day colloquium. He expressed his gratitude without embarrassment or hesitation, openly and emotionally. It was a remarkable display of hakarat hatov (acknowledging the good that others have done for you), by a buttoned-down, business-suit, silk-tie executive.

"Thank you for your friendship and belief in Israel's tourism industry." It was as if Federman had reached into the audience and personally extended his hand of appreciation to each of the hundreds who were there.

The underlying basis, of course, for Federman's gratitude (and, it must be added, for that of the prime minister and all the officials who addressed the conference) is that, because of the country's size, tourism plays a core, structural role in underpinning Israel's economy. It directly touches the lives of Israelis more quickly and more efficiently than any other industry.

Every 100,000 tourists to Israel contribute $210 million (US) to the GDP and add 5,400 jobs. It is not difficult, therefore, to understand how the "disappearance" of tourists to Israel these past three years has wounded the economy.

But even this macro-economically valid statement cannot convey the more profoundly painful "micro" truth, that countless families and individuals – Israeli and Palestinian – have been economically, psychologically and emotionally wounded by the disappearance of the tourists.

To be sure, there has been a marked upswing in tourism to Israel in the past six months. But, Federman pleaded, there is still a long recovery ahead, as indicated by the most recent unemployment figure in Israel, which stands around 12 per cent.

The tourism industry produces the highest, speediest rewards of all of Israel's economic sectors to the overall economic well-being of the country.

What is, however, often lost on the potential tourist when he or she hears or reads this message is that being a tourist to Israel also produces one of the highest and speediest rewards to oneself as well. In the word of Benjamin Elon, Israel's minister of tourism, "Tourism to Israel is not just an industry, or a visit, or a trip. It is a spiritual experience."

If only more people would come to know and understand this for themselves.

Life insurance available for Israel travellers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An American insurance company recently announced it will introduce a life insurance policy that does not exclude travellers to Israel.

MassMutual Financial Group stated it would provide up to $1.5 million (US) in coverage for visitors who spend 30 days or less per year in the Jewish state.

"After an extensive review of the risks associated with travel to Israel, we determined it was appropriate to revise our underwriting practice," states promotional material from MassMutual. "As a result, clients travelling to Israel may now be eligible for up to $1.5 million of permanent coverage without any extra premiums due to travel."

In addition to the 30-day restriction, travellers to Israel must visit "for a purpose other than missionary or military."

The CJN reported recently that Canadian applicants for life insurance policies were being turned down if they indicated they planned to visit Israel within one year. Large re-insurance companies, who are responsible for paying most of the benefits for successful claims, compelled local insurers to deny coverage to travellers to Israel, said David Brown, a spokesperson for Al G. Brown & Associates. That practice left many travellers to Israel without coverage. Brown contended that very few tourists to Israel have been killed in terrorist attacks – certainly not enough to warrant refusal of coverage.

The announcement by MassMutual gives Americans the option of receiving coverage and travelling to Israel, he said. A second American insurer, New York Life, may soon be announcing a similar policy, he said.

'Don't let my brother's murder be forgotten'

'Chezi' Goldberg honoured at memorial service

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

"This is my son. This could be your son, your brother, your father. I could be your mother standing here."

The nearly 1,000 people who jammed the hall at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation sat silently as they listened to the simple, yet poignant, words of Ruth Goldberg as she held up a picture of her dead son. She was speaking at the end of a March 2 memorial ceremony for her son, Yechezkel (Chezi) Goldberg, who was killed in a Jan. 29 suicide bombing in Jerusalem.

The evening was sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada and Mizrachi of Canada.

Although Goldberg was a Torontonian, and most of his family still lives in Thornhill, he, his wife and seven children lived in Jerusalem.

A social worker, he specialized in working with troubled children and adolescents. He also wrote a regular column for New York's Jewish Press.

Democracy, Ruth Goldberg said, owes every mother three things: "safety, security, defence."

Her son would still be alive, she said, "if the world would abide by one standard with regard to the wall in Israel... We must admit that terrorism does not respect borders, zip codes, culture, race or religion."

Thanking ZAKA for its efforts to maintain the dignity of the dead and injured, she said, "If only the leaders of the world would give equal value to the living as ZAKA gives to the dead."

Joe Volpe, the federal minister of human resources and skills development, brought condolences from the federal government. Stressing several times that there is a new prime minister in Ottawa, he pledged the government's support for Israel, "the symbol of all we hold dear.

"We stand by Israel's side and the values it generates... against terrorism and barbarism."

Stockwell Day, representing the Conservative Party, echoed Volpe's words. "We will not let you stand alone."

He said representatives of all four parties plan to put a motion before Parliament to declare suicide bombings a crime against humanity.

Ontario Minister of Community Safety and Correctional Services Monte Kwinter, speaking on behalf of the provincial government, said that while everyone shares in the "despair" that should be shared "by all of good conscience," at the core is a family's tragedy.

"All other layers [of emotion] shouldn't hide the true tragedy – the loss of a son, a brother, a father, a husband."

Rabbi Baruch Taub, spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph, said sympathy and love for the family must be converted into a "pragmatic commitment." He urged people to help Chezi Goldberg's family, which includes seven young children, by contributing to the Chezi Goldberg Memorial Fund, which is being administered by B'nai Brith.

Rabbi Taub disputed the statement by a Hamas leader that the Jews' greatest weakness is that they cherish life. "That's not our weakness – it's our greatest strength."

Hamas, he said, "calls on their kids to kill themselves. We call on ours to dedicate their life to Torah," and to building up a strong and healthy state.

Chezi Goldberg's brother, Chaim, concluding his study of a passage of Talmud, as is traditional during the month after death, called his brother "a holy soul, who died just because he was a Jew, sanctifying the name of God."

Asking audience members to "take on one more mitzvah, put on tfillin if you are a man, light Shabbat candles if you are a woman," he urged them not to "let my brother's murder be forgotten. Let it be an inspiration to us all."

Messages of support and condolence were also brought by Ya'akov Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, from Israeli President Moshe Katsav and from Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada. Also delivering support and condolences were Rabbi Yitzchok Feigenbaum, principal of Tiferet Bais Yaakov high school and a friend of Chezi Goldberg's; Harold Davis, senior vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada; and Kurt Rothschild, co-chair of World Mizrachi.

Rudy Bromberg sang K'El Malei Rachamim and led O Canada and Hatikvah. Aaron Goldberg, another brother, said Kaddish.

Among the dignitaries in attendance were Don Sinclair, Canadian ambassador to Israel; Vaughan mayor Michael Di Biase and councillor Susan Kadis; MPP Mario Racco; MPs Elinor Caplan, and Art Eggleton; representatives of the consulates of Bulgaria, India and Romania; Tony Clement, candidate for leader of the Conservative Party; Rabbi David Schochet, chair of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto; York Region police chief Armand Labarge; Insp. John Wallace, representing Toronto police chief Julian Fantino, and representatives of several Christian organizations.

Israel's first Arab ambassador promotes education

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ali Yahya may be a diplomat – the first Arab to serve as an Israeli ambassador – but his greatest passion was, is and remains teaching.

As the former head of an immersion program in Israel, teaching different languages was always important to Yahya. But these days, education for tolerance, mutual understanding and the improvement of relations between communities tops his agenda.

"I'm an educator in my soul," he says, as he taps his chest in one of the many animated gestures that punctuate his comments.

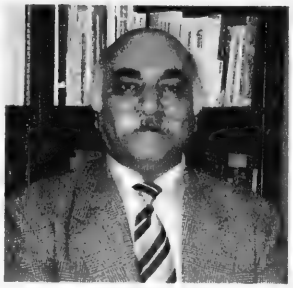
"I think it's the most important thing, whether in developed or less developed countries. Education is the master key of what we do in our society, especially in areas of conflict. Coexistence, that [requires] education."

Yahya's current posting in the Israeli foreign service as co-ordinator/advisor for special projects in the Department for Middle East and the Peace Process allows him to practise what he preaches. Before that, he was Israel's ambassador to Finland from 1995 to 1999.

Yahya was in Canada recently for a series of lectures and meetings with academics, politicians and civil servants. The theme of his discussion was addressing the challenges of multiculturalism and identity in Israel.

As co-ordinator of special projects, his job is to reach out to Israel's Arab neighbours and create joint programs to advance peaceful relations. Yahya, 57, visits Egypt and Jordan, two Arab countries that have concluded peace treaties with Israel, and he's met diplomats and political leaders in Tunisia, Morocco and Qatar. He plans to attend an interfaith conference in Oman as Israel's representative.

"I know the mentality on both sides," he explains.



Ali Yahya

Based on his experiences visiting the wider Middle East, Yahya believes the atmosphere is not yet ripe for expanding the list of countries that will agree to official relations with Israel.

However, over the past 20 years, leaders and elites in these countries radically changed their views of Israel and many now acknowledge Israel as a permanent fixture in the region, he said. They are ready to accept it, but the populations of these countries, many radicalized by Islamic fundamentalists, aren't ready to take that step.

"The Arab world does not know Israel. They know what the media and extremists tell them.

"If we create an atmosphere that it is in their benefit to have relations with Israel, the populations will understand it," he suggested. "First we must create a situation where people are not being killed."

Many Arabs are surprised when they learn he represents the government of Israel. But, he said, many minorities have risen to high ranks in the Jewish state. The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) boasts a Druze general, while the national police force also has a Druze general. Meanwhile thousands of Arabs and Druze serve in the IDF.

Israel's Declaration of Independence, he notes, states that Arabs would be equal citizens of Israel.

Yahya dismisses the description of Israel's security barrier as an "apartheid wall," calling it "political terminology."

Israel must defend its people, including its Arab citizens, he said. Israeli Arabs, many of whom support construction of the barrier, were among the victims in the attack on the Maxim restaurant in Haifa and he points out he and his five children all ride public buses in Israel.

Yahya believes that like other minorities, such as Russians, Ethiopians and Moroccans, Israel's Arabs can and do complain about their treatment. That is typical of minorities everywhere, he said.

The October 2000 protests and riots by Israeli Arabs that led to police shooting 13 demonstrators, marked a low point in relations. That incident has been thoroughly examined by a reputable inquiry, he said.

"The mistake has been done. Everybody is sorry for that. For sure it wasn't a bouquet of flowers. People were killed. People are sorry for that. Now, the question is to learn to live together," he added.

Ya'akov "Kobi" Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, said the incident was the result of "a lack of understanding and lots of suspicions. So, the Israeli government took a decision to establish community police, police stations within the villages and towns, and work in co-operation with local leadership."

"I try with a group to make a kind of reconciliation between the Israeli Arabs and the police," Yahya added.

Prior to his diplomatic career, Yahya served as general manager of Ulpan Akiva, a language immersion program in Netanya that educated thousands of visitors to Israel, including U.S. senators, clergymen and international students.

His resumé includes numerous educational and lecture positions, and he is often sought by the Israeli media for comment on issues related to coexistence and multiculturalism.

"I was very involved in the life of Israel," he said. "I am involved in the matter of coexistence. That is my purpose in life. There is no choice."

"Israelis, as Arabs and Jews, must learn how to live together."

Ominous development

The attack last Saturday on the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) at the Erez junction in northern Gaza was the fourth attempt there against Israeli lives since last June. In the three previous attacks, eight soldiers and one Israeli civilian were killed. And while there were no Israeli casualties in the assault on Saturday, it was an ominous, new development in the Palestinian war of terror against Israel.

The operation was a joint effort of the Fatah's Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The three groups warned it was only the beginning of a new combined offensive.

Despite its failure, the assault demonstrated a great deal of planning and sophisticated preparation. The attackers were suicide killers armed with automatic weapons in vehicles packed with explosives. Two of the three cars were painted in Israeli army colours with Hebrew lettering. The drivers wore IDF uniforms.

The operation was thwarted by the quick, decisive response of Israeli soldiers manning their guard posts, and according to some preliminary evidence, by Palestinian policemen as well. At least three Palestinian security officers were killed and some 20 were injured when one of the bomb-laden cars exploded beside the Palestinian police station rather than at the Israeli guard post.

The Erez junction is the main crossing point from Gaza into Israel. Thousands of Palestinian workers enter Israel at Erez each day. The junction is itself in an industrial area in which many Palestinians work in factories. It is generally crowded with the traffic of Israelis, Palestinians, the IDF and Palestinian security forces, and thus an attractive staging ground for terrorists to kill Israeli soldiers while exploiting the sheltering cover of unarmed civilians.

The attack Saturday was part of the ongoing campaign by extremist Palestinian rejectionists to disrupt any sense of economic order or co-operation between Israelis and Palestinians. Their purpose is to sever and render untenable all relations between the two nationalities and to sabotage any possibility of coexistence. It was probably also an attempt simply to inflict heavy losses of Israeli life, thereby reinforcing the false impression that any unilateral dismantling by Israel of its Gaza communities would be a retreat by the Jews in the face of withering Islamic fire.

That may explain, in part, the IDF's incursion the day after the failed attack into Nuseirat and Al-Bureij, heavily populated refugee camps in the Gaza Strip. Fifteen Palestinians – three of them under the age of 16 – were killed. The army had set out to destroy missile-production facilities. But it had probably also set out to destroy the image of an army fleeing from enemy territory, the image many Arabs celebrated in their minds after Israel withdrew from Lebanon in May 2000 and which, many Israeli observers believe, contributed to the decision by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat to launch his war of terror some five months later.

Alas, Israel is still fighting that war. And Israelis and Palestinians both are suffering.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO...

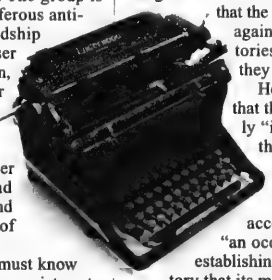
Jews and South Africa

As a former South African living in Toronto, I feel I must respond to your article on Judge Albie Sachs's lecture on Jews in South Africa. ("Apartheid fighter discusses Jewish role in struggle," CJN, Feb.12).

- Sachs, Joe Slovo and other Jewish anti-apartheid activists fled South Africa in the 1960s and lived in luxury in England and Russia.
- The true Jewish fighters who remained in South Africa were people such as Helen Suzman, Harry Schwartz, Roly Arenstein, Raymond Suttner and others.
- Sadly, those mentioned in the first point above were Jewish in name and by birth only, having married out of the faith and not practising any form of Judaism.
- The African National Congress (ANC) has gone out of its way to alienate Jewish supporters. The group is actively pro-Palestinian and takes a vociferous anti-Israel stand. When asked about his friendship with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi and other known terrorist leaders, Nelson Mandela said the ANC will not alienate its friends at the expense of America and Israel.
- The majority of South African Jews never supported the nationalist government and were at the forefront of trying to educate and uplift the standards and living conditions of the black population.



I feel Jews in Canada, my new home, must know that it was not only the Jewish ANC/Communist party members who fought for a better South Africa. Two former chief rabbis, Bernard Casper and Moses Weiler, also made themselves heard in the fight for social justice.

Questions for Claims Conference

I am confounded by the amount of time the Claims Conference takes to make pay-outs to those who have submitted applications for Holocaust reparations.

The Claims Conference is staffed by Jewish officers whose job it is to distribute monies turned over to it by the government of Germany.

My application is now more than two years old, and all I get are letters advising me that in some distant future, I can expect to receive compensation.

If the Claims Conference is trying to show enough contempt so that claimants will be disappointed with Jewish officials, it's doing one hell of a job.

Double standard against Jews

Swastikas are illegal in The Hague, yet Arabs were allowed to carry them on their signs and flout them at a memorial tribute to the six million Jews at the International Court of Justice, where the hearing on Israel's security fence began last month.

By contrast, Jews were not allowed to carry and wave Israeli flags in the streets as they walked to their bus, and Arabs carried a large flag, undisturbed by the police.

Once again, the theme is the same: one standard for the world and another for Israel.

Barrier will bring more misery

Ed Morgan presents an interesting account of Israel's potential arguments before the International Court of Justice in defence of its separation barrier ("Hak'n the great wall of chainik," CJN, Feb. 19). Morgan states that the question before the Court shows bias against Israel, since it describes the territories as "occupied," while Israel argues they are "in dispute."

However, even accepting the argument that the territories' sovereignty is currently "in dispute," can anyone, in view of the reality on the ground, credibly argue that they are not "occupied" by Israel?

Indeed, Morgan himself seems to accept this reality, since he argues that "an occupying power can protect itself by establishing defensive installations in the territory that its military controls."

Furthermore, even if a territory is "disputed," that does not erase its inhabitants' human rights. On the contrary, as Morgan states: "If we are to take the law seriously, we must also concede that an occupying power is obliged to treat the population of the territory benevolently, disrupting civilian life as little as possible."

According to the Globe and Mail, the barrier, as currently planned, will affect 206 Palestinian communities, representing 38 per cent of the West Bank population. Forty-two villages will be completely enclosed. Others will be cut off from farmland, jobs and education.

Given that this encroachment deep into West Bank territory is being done to protect Israeli settlements, with their own continuing legacy of land expropriation and dispossession, how can one credibly argue that the barrier complies with Israel's obligation to act "benevolently, disrupting civilian life as little as possible?"

The barrier is supposed to separate Israelis from Palestinians, but, as presently conceived, it will only engender more dispossession, misery and violence. Even Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, with his recent Gaza evacuation initiative, seems to have reached the inescapable conclusion that there is no way to "separate" without ending the occupation.

Perspectives

Parents should find other ways to discipline children

By RON LEVIN

"If we ever turn towards a kindlier society and a safer world, a revulsion against the physical punishment of children would be a good place to start." – Dr. Benjamin Spock.

There is never any justification, in my judgment, for spanking a child. At Jewish Family and Child Service, we strongly believe all forms of physical violence including physical punishment (spanking) are harmful and unacceptable.

So why do parents spank? Some spank because they were spanked as children and are modelling the environment in which they grew up. Some honestly believe spanking is an appropriate way to teach and discipline children. Some spank, not because they believe it to be the right thing to do, but because they, like all of us, become frustrated or angry and lose their self-control.

There are those who claim spanking is about the use of light taps and slaps on the hands and buttocks and insist that spanking should not be considered a form of physical punishment. They are wrong. Thousands of children in Canada suffer abuse each year in the name of discipline. Health Canada recognizes that "child physical abuse is usually connected to physical punishment or is confused with child discipline."

Ron Levin

Physical punishment can never be considered as an appropriate way to discipline children. We cannot condone even what is considered to be "reasonable force," because to do so is to put children at risk.

The accumulated research of five decades underscores the ineffectiveness and harm caused by physical punishment. Recently, a coalition of children's hospitals, child welfare and family service agencies and public health organizations agreed that physical punishment places children at risk of physical injury, is linked to impaired parent-child relationships and is a risk factor for poorer mental health. Furthermore, children who receive physical punishment are less likely to internalize moral values and have increased levels of aggression and greater tolerance of violence in adulthood.

Studies carried out at the University of New Hampshire indicate children who are frequently spanked have lower scores on tests of cognitive ability than children who are never or rarely spanked. In addition, results from research done at McMaster University demonstrated that children who are spanked are twice as likely to develop drug and alcohol problems in adulthood and have increased rates of anxiety disorders, anti-social behaviour and depression.

Other studies have shown that spanked children show less creativity and are less inclined to take healthy risks, but more likely to take inappropriate risks. They report that children who are spanked tend to be less happy as adults and in their marriages, and tend to have a higher than average chance of being in an abusive relationship.

Of course, not all children who are spanked develop these symptoms.

So what does constitute effective discipline? The Canadian Paediatric Society states: "Effective and positive discipline is about teaching and guiding children, not just forcing them to obey. The goal of effective discipline is to foster acceptable and appropriate behaviour in the child and to raise emotionally mature adults."

Effective discipline that is age appropriate and incorporates non-violent techniques that we can all acquire, helps children learn to control or change their behaviour because they come to understand what is right and wrong. It is about explaining and reasoning, establishing rules and consequences. It is about being good role models as parents.

Israel and 10 other countries have explicitly abolished all forms of physical punishment by parents and caregivers, and 90 nations have abolished physical punishment in their school systems. In June 2000, the Israeli Supreme Court outlawed all physical punishment "or methods that demean and humiliate the child as an educational system."

Millions of dollars are spent each year to address the tragedy of child abuse. As well, across the nation, schools are responding to bullying and violence among students, by using costly programs aimed at character education and safe and caring environments. It is inconsistent and confusing to tell a child that inflicting pain and being violent is wrong and then to inflict pain by spanking or hitting him or her.

There is no situation that changes hitting from a wrong thing to do to a right thing.

A child learns to become the kind of human being that he or she has experienced. As parents, as citizens and as Jews, we must reject spanking.

Ron Levin is executive director of Jewish Family and Child Service in Toronto. Prior to assuming this position, he was a professor of social work at the University of Calgary.

The Supreme Court of Canada recently ruled that spanking is legal, and protected under the constitution, "if the force does not exceed what is reasonable under the circumstances." The CJN asked two noted individuals in the community to respond to this decision.

Corporal punishment - a very qualified yes

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

There is no commandment and thus no Jewish requirement to physically punish a child who misbehaves. Nevertheless, the biblical tradition, consistent with that of other ancient cultures, presumed that the application of physical force was an essential ingredient of the educational process.

The Book of Proverbs (13:24) declares that "he who spares the staff hates his son, but he who loves his son should discipline him daily." Ibn Ezra and Gersonides are no doubt correct in thinking that the ancient understanding of "discipline" was a physical beating.

The Book of Proverbs (29:15) goes on to state that "the rod and reproof give wisdom, but a child left to himself causes shame to his mother," and (29:17) "Correct your son, and he will give you rest; indeed, he will give delight."

Apparently, the ancients held that physical force was necessary to prevent delinquency and inculcate morality. This is reflected in the midrash (Exodus Rabbah 1:1) that teaches: "If one refrains from punishing [mardut, in Hebrew, which means physical force] a child, the child will end up being utterly depraved."

Rabbi Wayne Allen

It was on the basis of the latter verse that the Talmud (Makkot 5a) rules that if a parent or teacher beats a child and the child dies as a result, there is no crime of manslaughter, even if the child is beaten as a preventive and not because of some misdeed.

By the third century of the common era, rabbinic opinion moderated. The Babylonian scholar Rav (Baba Batra 21a) advised that schoolchildren were only to be beaten with a shoe strap which, according to Rashi, meant the application of light and non-debilitating blows. To do otherwise would violate the talmudic injunction (Gitin 6b) against excessively terrorizing one's children.

Further limiting the possible application of physical force to children, Maimonides (Mishneh Torah, Laws of Rebels 6:9) rules that if a man beats an adult son, the former is placed under the ban since he has transgressed the commandment against placing a stumbling block before the blind (Leviticus 19:14). In other words, Maimonides acknowledged that corporal punishment is counterproductive when children are mature.

This led 13th-century Rabbi Yom Tov ibn Ashbili (cf. Birkei Yosef to Yoreh De'ah 240:2) to add that maturity is not restricted to ages but to stages as well. Even a child under the age of bar mitzvah should not be physically punished if such punishment is deemed psychologically harmful to that particular child.

While our tradition has effectively limited corporal punishment, it has not eliminated it. Let me speculate on why this is the case. First, our tradition intuited that psychological punishment may be far worse than corporal punishment. Thus, for example, the popular Yiddish saying proclaims, "A potch fargeyt, a vort bashteyt," a slap passes, but an insulting remark remains. Light physical reprimands may not be as painful or enduring as other forms of discipline. Sometimes psychological harm is far worse than physical.

Second, light physical reprimands are attention-getters more than actual punishment. The story is told of the fellow who claimed that he could train even the most stubborn mule with kindness alone.

When faced with the challenge, he took a club and hit the mule squarely on the muzzle. "But you claimed to use kindness alone!" the onlookers objected. "That is true," the man replied, "but first I have to get its attention."

Others forms of punishment will work better when the subject's attention is first gained. Light, physical contact may serve as the vehicle for establishing the seriousness of the offence and getting the child's attention.

Finally, corporal punishment – in certain circumstances – may be the only deterrent that works.

Since the socialization and future integration of a child into civil society is at stake, no parent or teacher should be denied a tool in the arsenal of effective education.

By its recent decision, the Supreme Court of Canada has not added anything to what the Jewish tradition has long realized, nor does it contravene Jewish tradition. The Supreme Court has simply confirmed it.

Rabbi Allen has served Beth Tikvah Synagogue for almost 17 years. He was ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in 1977 and is currently pursuing a PhD in philosophy at York University.

Jews by choice

Jews by choice have become quite common in the West. Often they're women and men who, for reasons of marriage, have chosen to embrace their spouse's religion to make sure their children will be Jewish. They've had to make sacrifices in the process that involve much study and considerable re-adjustment to a different way of life. In Canada, as in Europe, all branches of Judaism seem to be following criteria of conversion established by Jewish law and hallowed by time, albeit at different levels of stringency.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

It's different in countries of the former Soviet bloc. There, Jews never had the right to choose. Most had to endure their Judaism. One young man, who is now a leader in his Jewish community in Ukraine told me when I visited there a couple of weeks ago that as a youth he suffered much humiliation from his classmates and discrimination from the authorities. When he complained to his head teacher, he was told a nose job might relieve his problem.

After the fall of Communism, he sought out the Jewish community and now walks the streets of his city wearing a large black kippah. He's not really observant, perhaps not even religious, but he wants to identify as a Jew and his headgear is a badge he wears with pride. Having suffered as a Jew, he now wants to celebrate his Jewish identity. His is very much a Judaism of choice.

Ironically, it was often non-halachic Jews who suffered most. Though they had non-Jewish mothers, they carried their fathers' Jewish surnames and had "Jew" written in their documents. Today, they – even more than children of Jewish mothers and non-Jewish fathers – are among those who want to show that they belong.

Formal conversion according to Jewish law is, of course, an option, but few take it. It's not the Jewish legal definition that's on their minds, but their identification with the Jewish people. Both Orthodox and progressive religious leaders tend to accept the reality and don't seem to probe too much. Thus, many of the Jewish schools and kindergartens I visited – even those under religious auspices – had many non-halachic Jews as students and staff.

A more stringent approach would probably keep many of them out. They would be lost to our people. As emigration to Israel has declined, most will make their lives in the countries where they live. Many hope to lead the same kind of Jewish life you and I do, irrespective of the demands of Jewish law.

After all we did to fight for their freedom from Communist oppression, how can we now question their Judaism by quibbling over their status?

Controversy in Israeli courts

An international scholar and sociology expert came to the University of Calgary earlier this month to present a provocative and controversial set of findings on the way legal matters are handled in Israeli courts.

Arye Rattner, the director of the Center for the Study of Crime, Law and Society at the University of Haifa, has been a consultant on national public policy issues and has served as an expert witness in the courts.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

In his presentation, he discussed the results of a study that looked at more than 60,000 police records to determine if there were any racial or ethnic disparities in the sentencing and trial process in Israel's court system.

Specifically, the study looked at two ethnic groups: Jewish and Arab citizens who live within the boundaries and borders of the state of Israel.

The audience's reaction to Rattner's study was mixed, as it found many more instances of discrimination against Arabs than Jews in Israel's criminal justice system.

For instance, Rattner found that Arabs have a significantly higher probability of being convicted than Jews do.

"Taking into account such factors as the same prior criminal record, the same offence, same age and family status, the probability for an Arab to be convicted is much higher than for his Jewish brother," Rattner said.

"Some recent studies identify race or ethnic origin of the victim as a key factor in determining the course of criminal justice," he added, describing a similar finding for prison sentencing among the two groups.

In addition to the ethnicity of the victim, the key factors in conviction and sentencing are the ethnicity of the judge and the ethnicity of the offender, he said.

For the first stage of his research, Rattner and his associates read 60,000 computerized police records that were randomly retrieved from the Israeli police computer system.

In addition, they studied more than 3,000 court records from two major regional courts in the northern part of Israel – Haifa and Nazareth, where there is a greater mix of Jews and Arabs than in other areas.

"Each file contained comprehensive information on the judge, defendant, victim and prosecution," said Rattner.

"We found that Arab defendants always had a much higher probability of receiving prison sentences in relation to the nationality of the judge compared to Jewish defendants.

"When a Jewish judge handles the trial of either a Jewish or an Arab defendant, we found that the victim's nationality doesn't matter."

However, for Arab judges, the difference in their handling of the trial process was significant, as they tended to treat Arab criminals more harshly.

If the judge is Arab, the criminal is Jewish and the victim is Arab, the probability of the defendant receiving a prison sentence is lower than if the victim were Jewish, the study found.

But Arab criminals are more likely to receive a prison sentence if the victim is Jewish than if the victim is Arab.

A possible explanation, Rattner said, was that "those who have made it as judges from the Arab community do not want to be perceived by the judicial community as being more lenient towards their peers. This would create headlines and result in unwanted publicity."

Rattner concluded that the lives of Jewish victims are more highly valued in the courts than the lives of Arab victims.

Some audience members disputed his findings, and I suspect the results will always be questioned because this is a sensitive topic.

It's no surprise that negative attitudes and stereotypes have invaded the courtroom. We see similar cases all the time in Canada when aboriginals are tried in court in a manner that differs significantly from the way Caucasian defendants' cases are handled.

In my mind, this disparity leaves open the question of whether the underdogs in the courtroom are really the Jews or the Arabs.

It also raises another question: whether this discriminatory attitude in the courtroom will create more discrimination in wider Israeli society, resulting in the victimization of more innocent people.

Regardless of ethnic origin, what the lecture made poignantly clear to me is that the players on the legal scene are human beings who don't live in a vacuum, and it is naive to assume otherwise.

Oy, my aching tush!

Reading week may be the best invention ever. Unfortunately, the same cannot be said of the snowboard. As I type this column, my fingers are the only parts of my body that have free range of motion without pain.

After a solid week of relaxation, I tried a day of physical activity, and I can honestly say that I don't know what I was thinking.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

I've been skiing almost as long as I've been walking. But my baggage allotment on flights back to Halifax from my home in Toronto ends up being filled with kosher meat and clothing (necessities for every Jewish girl), leaving no room for skis and boots. Without my own gear, I figured it made no sense to use second-rate rental equipment. So snowboarding it was. Silly, silly me.

I grew up during the rise of snowboarding as a popular sport, so I've been exposed to different sentiments about it. From my father's contention that the only difference between a vacuum cleaner and a snowboard is the dirtbag attached to them, to my friends who relish every minute on their boards, I have heard all sides of the ski/snowboard debate.

As a skier, I have my own biases, and it would be a lie to say I haven't made a comment or two about reckless boarders who park in the middle of runs or tear down the hill out of control. Nevertheless, I like to try new things, and if it involves snow and hills, how bad could it be?

This was not my first time snowboarding, but the five-year hiatus was enough for me to forget exactly what snowboarding entails for a beginner. I felt like a TV blooper highlight reel: every few minutes, I would come crashing down in the snow and wonder why snowboarding was supposed to be fun.

After two runs, I could no longer feel my rear end, which, in retrospect, was for the best, given the pain I felt once the numbness subsided. Now, my bum is black and blue, creating a nice shade of purple, but it no longer makes for a comfy seat.

My snow stunts became a sort of running joke. As I fell over and over again on my bum, it became clear my happiness level was not exactly soaring. I tried to be a trooper, but when you're in pain, it's not easy. When I finally fell on my front, having ventured onto the toe-edge of the snowboard in the hope of actually turning, as the sport demands, I was relieved to at least be inflicting abuse on another part of my body. But the relief was short-lived, since the force of the fall threw me over onto my tailbone, ensuring that the misery would be spread all over my poor little body – and straight back to my bum.

After my failed attempts on the large hill, I was advised to tackle the bunny hill. The funny thing about the bunny hill is that it's harder to get up than to get down. If you're a skier, you'll know what I mean: the rope tow. The most dreaded of all lift apparatuses, the rope tow does not work well with a snowboard. I quickly learned this sad fact as I fell off the thing three times before taking off my board to walk up the hill.

By the end of the day, I was back on the chairlift making solid turns down beginner runs. I felt a sense of pride and accomplishment for having persevered, and, on some level, conquered the snowboard. Or so I thought.

The next day, I woke up to find my entire body in pain. We're not talking aches from newly worked muscles or that satisfying soreness from a good workout. Not quite. I can't turn my neck, bend my back or lift my arms and shoulders. The day-after pain destroyed every remaining ounce of satisfaction and pride I was able to salvage from a day spent mostly on my butt.

And so it's back to the daily grind of school and work. I might be brave (or stupid) enough to venture onto a snowboard again, but for that to happen, my recent experience will have to become a rose-coloured memory.

The Kirshner File

The decision to invade Iraq was sound

The strongest American rationale for launching last year's invasion of Iraq was that Saddam Hussein harboured illicit weapons of mass destruction and the long-range missiles required to deliver them, and that he thereby posed a clear and present threat to U.S. allies in the Middle East, including Israel.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto.

"This is what the war was about," said President George W. Bush's former press secretary, Ari Fleischer, in no uncertain terms.

In the runup to the war, whose first anniversary will be marked on March 19, Bush declared: "If we know that Saddam Hussein has dangerous weapons today – and we do – does it make any sense for the world to wait to confront him as he grows even stronger and develops even more dangerous weapons?"

Donald Rumsfeld, the U.S. secretary of defence, was even more emphatic: "We do know that the Iraqi regime currently has chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction."

The United States, on the basis of pre-war intelligence estimates, was not the sole country making these claims.

Tony Blair, the British prime minister, warned that Iraq could unleash weapons of mass destruction within 45 minutes of an order.

Hans Blix

And proceeding from a similar assumption after being struck by 39 Iraqi Scud missiles during the 1991 Gulf War, Israel girded itself for another attack. Gas masks were distributed. Health care workers were inoculated. Reserves were called up. Arrow missile sites were readied for doomsday scenarios.

Even France, Russia and Germany, which opposed the rush to war and called for more intrusive United Nations inspections of Iraqi facilities, assumed that Iraq had a massive stockpile of weapons of mass destruction.

But a year on, the real, unvarnished truth about Iraq's non-conventional weapons has begun to emerge in dribs and drabs.

And what the picture shows is that while Saddam had fearsome arms programs, he did not actually have the weapons he was widely credited with possessing, as U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell has admitted. Powell's statement is of the utmost importance, because he presented the definitive case for going to war to disarm Iraq.

And no less a person than George Tenet, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, now acknowledges that the United States may have overestimated Iraq's capacities.

Hans Blix, the former chief UN weapons inspector, is even more categorical. "My guess," he observed recently, "is that there are no weapons of mass destruction left."

In light of these statements, serious questions have been raised about the professionalism of the CIA and other spy organizations. Some observers have even impugned the integrity of the CIA, suggesting that it cynically manipulated data. Indeed, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace has concluded that the Bush administration systematically misrepresented the menace emanating from Iraq.

Still other critics believe that the war to topple Saddam's Baathist regime has diverted scarce resources from the battle against Islamic fundamentalist terrorism, as exemplified by Al Qaeda.

In all probability, the United States and its allies genuinely assumed that Iraq had not disposed of its weapons of mass destruction. When the war started, Washington dispatched a specially-equipped unit – the 75th Exploitation Task Force – to search for them. Ninety high-priority sites, from the Military Industrialization Commission to the Amiriyah Serum and Vaccine Institute, were scoured, but no "smoking gun" was found.

Nor did senior Iraqi scientists or top-ranking former government officials, from Saddam on down, yield incriminating information. They consistently maintained that UN arms inspectors had fulfilled their mandate and destroyed Iraq's illegal armoury.

Having come up empty in the pursuit of such weapons, the Bush administration appointed David Kay, an ex-UN inspector, to study the matter. Kay was put in charge of the Iraq Survey Group, whose task, essentially, was to confirm the Bush administration's worst fears about Iraq.

Last October, Kay issued a report. It fell far short of U.S. expectations. His team uncovered "dozens of weapons-related program activities and significant amounts of equipment" that Iraq had concealed after the resumption of UN inspections in late 2002 – but no banned weapons.

After resigning from his post earlier this year, Kay dropped another bombshell – disclosing that Iraq had no stockpiles of proscribed weapons at the start of the war.

In a subsequent interview with The New York Times, Kay made a number of points:

- Iraqi scientists created fanciful weapons programs to curry favour with Saddam, who was increasingly out of touch with reality. In a reprise of the egregious miscalculations he made during the first Gulf War, Saddam thought the United States would not dare to invade Iraq.
- UN inspection teams eliminated most of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction between 1991 and 1998.
- The U.S. bombing campaign on Iraq in December 1998 destroyed existing chemical weapons programs.
- By 2003, the Iraqis were no longer producing biological weapons on a large scale, though they were researching better methods for weaponizing them.
- In 2001 and 2002, Iraq tried to resurrect its nuclear program, but it was never as advanced as programs in Iran or Libya.
- Iraq had an active missile program up to the moment of last year's invasion.
- Iraq kept a supply of defensive chemical- weapons suits and antidotes out of fear of an Israeli reprisal for the 1991 missile attacks.
- Severe looting after the 2003 invasion led to the loss of many key documents and other materials.

David Kay

Kenneth Pollack, a former CIA analyst and the author of The Threatening Storm: The Case for Invading Iraq, writes in his latest book, Spies, Lies and Weapons: What Went Wrong, that Saddam most likely scaled back his weapons program in 1996, keeping only what was absolutely vital to restart the programs at some future date. In doing do, Saddam hoped to persuade the UN to lift crippling economic sanctions. According to Pollack, the Bush administration relied on false information, fed by Iraqi exiles, to support its objective of regime change.

And in a major investigative piece, the Washington Post debunked the administration's hypothesis that Iraq had a concealed arsenal of old weapons and had the capability to manufacture a new generation of weapons.

Kay's successor, Charles Duelfer, a seasoned UN arms inspector, has asserted that "the prospect of finding weapons is close to nil." The task at hand, he believes, is to try to ascertain Iraq's pre-war intentions rather than to press on with a fruitless search for non-existent weapons in Iraq or Syria.

He may be right.

Saddam, currently languishing in an Iraqi cell following his capture on Dec. 13, was a self-aggrandizing, megalomanic serial aggressor whose ambitions exceeded his grasp. In an attempt to redraw the map of the Middle East and succeed Gamal Abdel Nasser as leader of the Arab world, he invaded Iran and Kuwait, attacked Israel and funnelled tens of millions of dollars to the families of Palestinian suicide bombers.

Had Saddam been left alone by the international community and had he succeeded in lifting the burdensome UN sanctions, he would have eventually rebuilt his weapons programs, and the Middle East might have been at his virtual mercy.

Condoleezza Rice, Bush's national security advisor, hit the mark when she said that Saddam had a terrible track record of aggression and that the United States "had no choice but to deal with that gathering threat to American interests and to the interests of our friends abroad."

In retrospect, the United States – deliberately or not – may have exaggerated Iraq's military capabilities. A bipartisan American presidential commission, established last month, is presently examining pre-war U.S. intelligence operations. And if heads must roll after its findings are released next autumn, so be it. But the basic decision to unseat Saddam, and to de-fang Iraq, a destabilizing force, was fundamentally sound and necessary.

If the United States and its allies, in the face of fierce opposition from Baathists and their ilk, can bring a measure of democracy to Iraq, the much-maligned invasion will have been worth every penny and every life lost. And if that historic objective is achieved, the global battle against Islamic jihadist terrorism can be joined with even greater vigour.

Jewish Life

Kerry family comes full circle

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

About a century ago, Fritz Kohn, a 29-year-old Czech-born Jew living in Austria, visited a government office in Vienna and officially changed his name to Frederick Kerry, for all intents and purposes abandoning his Jewish heritage at the same time.

When Kerry and family arrived at Ellis Island in 1905, they were listed in the manifest as Germans from Austria. The family settled initially in Chicago, did well in business, then moved a few years later to the Boston area, where the family would attain a reputation of being of solid Irish Catholic descent. But their American success story went sadly awry in 1921 when Frederick Kerry, facing bankruptcy, shot himself in the lobby of Boston's fancy Copley Plaza Hotel.

These obscure facts have come to light recently because Frederick Kerry's grandson is Senator John Forbes Kerry, the leading presidential contender for the U.S. Democratic party.

According to articles in the Boston Globe and Reform Judaism Magazine, Senator Kerry expressed amazement when a Boston Globe reporter presented him with a thorough dossier of his own family history. The file, compiled by reporter Michael Kranish, contained ship manifests, Ellis Island records, genealogical records, newspaper clippings and other materials.

"This is amazing… fascinating to me," Kerry said, explaining that he hadn't known his grandfather had been Jewish.

"This is incredible stuff. I think it is more than interesting; it is a revelation… It has a big emotional impact, because it obviously raises questions. I want to know what happened, why did they do this, what were they thinking, what was the thought process, and why, once they got over here, they never talked about it."

Kerry seemed to become emotional when reviewing the front-page newspaper stories about his grandfather's suicide, which had also been kept from him. "God, that's awful. Oh God, that's awful. This is kind of heavy," he said as he examined the material in his office.

"That explains a lot. It connects the dots. My dad was sort of painfully remote and shut off, and angry about the loss of his sister [who had died of cancer] and lack of a father."

Kerry is not the first prominent American government official to discover long-forgotten Jewish roots. Seven years ago, former U.S. secretary of state Madeleine Albright expressed amazement after making a similar discovery about her own Czech-Jewish ancestry. In Albright's case, she hadn't known that more than a dozen of her Jewish relatives, including three grandparents, had perished in Nazi concentration camps.

In a feature article published in Reform Judaism last fall, writer Jennifer Anne Perez explained that Frederick Kerry was one of many thousands of European Jews who turned their backs on their roots when they decided to come to America. Her story contained the astonishing postscript that John Kerry's younger brother Cameron, an attorney, converted to Judaism and married a Jewish woman in 1983.

"As a member of a Boston Brahmin family [perceived to be of supposedly Irish stock], Cameron thought he was entering uncharted territory," Perez wrote. "Only later did he realize that he was returning to his genealogical roots."

Cameron, who belongs to Temple Israel in Boston, told Perez he was delighted upon discovering the news. "It's been wonderful for the whole family," he said. "It's ironic – I guess things come full circle."

Hamilton genealogist Barry Spinner has also been exploring his family's Jewish roots lately. He and others have scheduled an inaugural meeting of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Hamilton and district. Dundas Public Library, April 27, 7 p.m. For further information, call 905-528-3776.

Muslims seen as members of the Jewish brotherhood

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

It is a well-known mitzvah that a Jew may not lend another Jew money with any sort of interest charged. This prohibition, however, does not extend to the lending of funds to non-Jews, from whose transactions one may indeed profit.

The rationale is that as a member of a brotherhood, a Jew should be ready to assist his co-religionists with no other gain than the knowledge that he is doing a mitzvah. With this explanation in mind, it would be reasonable to conclude that if a Jew should choose to leave his religion and accept another, this Jew, by virtue of his own separation from the Jewish people, is no longer a part of the brotherhood. One may then lend this individual money and charge him for the service as one would for any non-Jew.

A remarkable Halachah – point of Jewish law – follows this thought: should an individual who relinquished his faith and membership in the Jewish people join the Islamic faith, this person, even after disclaiming his Jewishness and totally embracing Islam, is nevertheless considered part of the Jewish brotherhood, and hence we are not to lend him money with interest.

Apparently, although Islam is clearly a faith altogether different from the Jewish faith, enough similarities exist in its fundamentals that a Muslim will retain his membership in the Jewish brotherhood, and we may not charge interest to this Jew-turned-Muslim.

The same is not true of the other major faith – Christianity. Although in the eyes of the world, the two are happily combined as the Judeo-Christian heritage, the halachic reality is otherwise.

One hopes the brouhaha caused by Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ will soon pass and that no new overt anti-Semitism will be born of it. But one must remember that the issue here is not the anti-Semitism in Gibson's film but the anti-Semitism of the Gospels to which this film is true. ("It is as it was," the Pope reportedly said after he saw the movie.)

The Gospels were written decades after the death of Jesus. Their accuracy was not only faded by time, but the different versions were coloured by a very specific agenda. In order to appeal to the Romans, the early Christians wanted to establish their new faith by clearly distancing themselves from Judaism (as the Jews would have nothing to do with them). The account of the crucifixion had to put the blame on the Jews – and more specifically, the Jewish leaders, the priests of the Temple.

The fact remains that during the Roman occupation, thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of people were summarily killed (and crucified) in the most barbaric fashions.

The Romans' lust for violence needs no further documentation. Our own account of their sporting murder of the 10 martyrs, including Rabbi Akiva and Rabbi Yishmael, makes that of Jesus' crucifixion seem tame by comparison.

We forget that, politically, the 20th century may have aligned the Christian religion more closely to Judaism. Politically today, the Muslim faith may seem the antithesis to our own, but reality says the opposite. Halachah concurs.

Can democracy and Islam co-exist?

After Jihad: America and the Struggle for Islamic Democracy*, by Noah Feldman, Farrar, Straus & Giroux $36.

This surprising book raises difficult and intriguing questions: Are Islam and democracy compatible? Could they interact or flourish together? Would democratic Islamic countries be friendly to Israel? Is democracy possible in Afghanistan and Iraq?

Books
Bernard Baskin

The author of After Jihad, Noah Feldman, is a young American observant Jew who is a highly regarded student of the Arab world. Recently, he helped to fashion a new Iraqi constitution. Feldman believes most Muslims feel a deep attraction to, and admiration for, American values of freedom, democracy and even the free market. After all, the United States has succeeded in generating prosperity for its people and unparalleled world power. In the minds of many Muslims, these are successes to be emulated, not resented.

"The criticism that is voiced again and again in the Muslim world is not that the United States is fundamentally flawed, but that it has failed to live up to its own values in its policies toward the Muslim world. Part of this has to do with the perception that the U.S. government has not been sympathetic to the situation of the Palestinian people, but an equal measure derives from American support of undemocratic Muslim governments."

Where Israel is concerned, the author asserts that democracy in the Arab world should actually make lasting peace with Israel more likely. Democratic governments that must respond to public pressure will have to deliver on economic development, he argues, saying trading relationships and business partnerships with Israel will be efficient ways to make that development happen. Commerce is the way for Israel to integrate itself into the Middle East, and commerce will be better served by governments that must stand for re-election.

Muslim anger at the hypocrisy of the United States may be wide, but it is not deep, Feldman contends, and it is a mistake to think that ordinary Muslims, or even Islamists, are inevitably or unalterably opposed to the United States. They watch American television, buy American goods – at least when not in the grip of exceptional frustration – and are learning English in schools and on television and the Internet. Indeed, the very fact so many Muslims say they are prepared to embrace democracy, a system they associate with the United States and its success, provides striking evidence that anti-Americanism may be overcome if the United States loosens its embrace of autocratic, corrupt and unfit Muslim rulers and regimes, Feldman says.

After Jihad suffers from a variety of problems. Often, its tentative solutions lack definition – they are more shadowy then specific. In addition, nowhere is there any serious discussion of the rights of ethnic and religious minorities within future and hoped-for democratic Islamic regimes. Finally, the word and concept "democracy" often acquire vague and shifting political meanings that differ widely from country to country around the globe.

Feldman looks forward to a time when Muslims will no longer understand jihad as a struggle against the "other," but as an inner struggle to master one's self and become a better Muslim, truly submissive to the will of Allah.

But judging by events in 2004, it seems the "old fashioned" jihad is still with us and is likely to be with us for the foreseeable future.

Kashering your kitchen

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Have you decided to keep a kosher kitchen? If you look in the Torah for guidance, you will find instructions such as "Thou shall not boil a kid in its mother's milk" (Deuteronomy 14:21) [http://makeashorterlink.com/?D25652977] or "Everything among the animals that has a split hoof… and that brings up its cud, that one you may eat." (Leviticus 11:3) [http://makeashorterlink.com/?G57715977]

Essential information, but it doesn't quite tell you how to kasher your oven, whether Corelle dishes are considered glass or whether you'll still be able to use your heirloom silverware. Today, advice from the Web on making the move to kosher both spiritually and practically. As always, keep in mind that for any halachic question, the final arbiter should be a rabbi you know and respect.

Before we get to the nitty gritty of how to make the transition, let's first look at the why. Rabbi Joseph Grunblatt poses the fundamental question, "Do you really think God cares what we eat?" His answer: "The G-d of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob does care about every individual… He is 'our Father in Heaven.' A father cares about the moral and spiritual development of his child but also takes care that the child is properly fed." [www.ou.org/kosher/intro.html]

For Leah Lederman, "[keeping kosher] was not a quick or easy decision; in fact, it wasn't until it became clear to me that, as a Jewish woman, I could no longer live any other way that we made the commitment." In her article "Easing into Kashrut," she writes that "just as a woman who is expecting her first baby may have difficulty envisioning caring for her child when he is 10 years old, a newcomer to kashrut may feel overwhelmed when encountering a person who has kept kosher all her life." Leah's advice:

- Give away your non-kosher foods to non-Jewish friends.
- Through experimentation and substitution, learn how to prepare your favourite foods.
- Set a clear family standard to reduce tensions and create a sense of unity.
- Relax and enjoy. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?T6634 2C77]

The Kosher Kitchen guide explains how to clean your kitchen and determine which pots and utensils can be made kosher. While it's relatively easy to kasher a refrigerator, an oven requires more work. [www.okkosher.com/Content.asp?ID=115] Also, while porcelain sinks are problematic to kasher, metallic ones require a thorough cleaning and boiling water. [www.njop.org/html/how_kosher. html] The rules for kashering a kitchen for Passover are similar. Some utensils merely require "hagalah" or boiling. Others require "libbun," or being heated until red-hot. For details, see the Star-K website. [www.star-k.org/kashrus/kk-passover-kashering.htm]

While many utensils can be kashered, others can't, or they're just not worth the effort. So how do you restock your drawers and pantry? Just before she went kosher, Fran Snyder threw a "Kashering Shower." Friends came to her home with brand new spatulas, mixing spoons and even a rice cooker. In return, she gave out party favours: spatulas marked "meat" and "dairy." [www.forward.com/issues/2001/01.10.05/fast3.html]

Going kosher isn't something you should try without professional assistance, and Rabbi Shoitel Lebovic comes into homes to help. He says he can usually kasher a home in one session, "including taking all the utensils for ritual dunking in a mikvah, blowtorching the oven, cleaning out the refrigerator and kitchen cabinets, and advising the client on what has to be thrown away. 'It's not rocket science. Lots of rabbis do this. But we have the system down.'" [www.okkosher.com/Content.asp?ID =240]

In "Our Family's Journey to Kosher," Jay Meyers describes the process and aftermath. "The first two weeks were the hardest. It was a challenge to remember in which pot to cook the hot dogs and which spoon to use to with the bowl of cereal." [http://torah.org/features/kosherhome/]

"Our family and friends who don't keep a kosher home look at us as if we are from another planet. I tell them that they too are Jewish. We are just more observant… I don't preach to others, because I don't like it when others pressure me. We see the process we've begun as a lifetime endeavour. We know we still have much to learn."

Next week, how to fill your pantries with kosher food.

Young Jewish journalists explore their craft

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Does being Jewish have anything to do with being a journalist? Are the two even related? Are newspapers biased against Israel? What's with all the talk about Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ? And who really owns the media?

These are some of the questions and issues that were raised at a recent panel discussion of young Jewish journalists called "On the Record." Coming up with answers were Hal Niedzviecki, former editor of Broken Pencil magazine and freelance culture reporter; Sarah Liss, music co-ordinator at Now magazine; Wall Street Journal reporter Elena Cherney; and National Post reporter Heather Sokoloff; while the CBC's Evan Solomon moderated.

So did their Jewish identity play a role in their decisions to work as journalists? Sokoloff said she wanted to be a Mideast correspondent because of her interest in Israel, until she got hooked on writing about education. Cherney went on the first March of the Living in 1988, going behind the Iron Curtain and into Poland before the Berlin Wall fell, and said the experience taught her the importance of bearing witness to historical events.

But in their day-to-day life, does being Jewish influence their work? All say no. Liss especially emphasizes that writing music reviews for Now has nothing to do with Judaism.

"I write about pop music. I think I've written about a klezmer band, like, once. It's kind of esoteric."

Later, she added that people have told her she has a Jewish style of writing.

"Maybe it's because I have a chatty style, I complain a lot? Oy…" she quipped.

But to Liss, an admitted skeptic of organized religion, the politics of her publication matter. Now, which billets itself as an alternative news source, is often criticized for being anti-Israel.

"If my politics differed that much from the paper then I wouldn't be writing for it, even a right-wing paper if it paid the bills."

Cherney, meanwhile, makes a habit of avoiding the Wall Street Journal's conservative editorial pages because she says they make her lose her appetite.

Interesting to note is that no one laid claim to complete objectivity.

"I don't claim to be objective," insisted Cherney. "I claim to be fair. A journalist's job is to be a lens."

Being fair, said Sokoloff, is giving equal coverage to both sides of an issue.

"Pro-Israel, pro-Zionist, isn't exactly fair," added Liss.

If there is a bias in the media, Solomon said, it doesn't always mean that the journalist or the network is biased. How a news outlet works can be whittled down to economics. Time is a scarce resource. Information is plentiful.

"Every Rwandan, Belgian, Jew, Arab, and Palestinian wants to get their story on our one-hour show," said Solomon, referring to the time-slot allotted to newscasts.

"If there's a terrorist bomb or a wall going up then you're going to report it… There are only so many pages [in a newspaper] and you need a story that's relevant."

Solomon compared that to a kind neighbour story, but said there is a limit to how many neighbour stories can be aired or published.

That's why CBC and the Wall Street Journal have policies to purge the word "terrorist" in order to appear less biased toward one side of any given conflict, said both Solomon and Cherney.

"It's such a pejorative term that you end up passing around a bias," Solomon said.

"If you call everyone a terrorist then it's just name-calling," Cherney added. "The important thing is the way you cover an event. It should be clear that if someone blew up a bus, it wasn't a nice thing."

But "the Post uses the word terrorist," Sokoloff said.

The panellists agreed that it's important to look at news coverage over a period of time to determine whether the media is biased or not.

What did they think of the coverage of The Passion of the Christ?

"It's probably good for the Jews because there's an overall sentiment that it's a bad movie," said Niedzviecki.

"It's coming out that Mel Gibson's religious beliefs are extremely radical and weird, but it needs to be taken seriously because he's a movie star, and movie stars need to be taken seriously," he said with sarcasm.

Niedzviecki said he think Jewish culture is represented positively in the media, aside from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

For example, Liss said Now covers the Jewish community in apolitical ways, with reports on standing in line outside the Harbord Bakery to buy challah for Rosh Hashanah.

"On the Record" was part of a speaker series sponsored by Holy Blossom's Generation Aleph, aimed at attracting young Jewish adults.

NCJW launches annual Passover food drive

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For the 21st year, the National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section, (NCJW) will be providing Pesach food baskets to people who need them.

Executive director Terry Winston said the annual Passover food drive brings together people of all ages, all levels of religious observance, Jews and non-Jews, individuals and corporate sponsors. "It knits the community," she said.

Volunteers help at drop-off points, as well as sorting, packing and delivering baskets, which include both basic Pesach foodstuffs (such as matzah, matzah meal, gefilte fish, grape juice, wine and frozen chicken) and ingredients for the seder, as well as candles and a Haggadah, including one in Russian if a recipient is Russian-speaking.

There is also a packet called "Community in an Envelope," Winston said. Agencies such as Jewish Family & Child Services, Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa, Circle of Care and Baycrest provide pamphlets about their services, since many recipients don't know what help is available.

Originally, the food drive was started to help the influx of immigrants from the former Soviet Union. Today, recipients also include students away from home, people with disabilities, the physically or mentally ill and people in shelters or hostels. NCJW gets referrals from some two dozen agencies, including Circle of Care, Reena, and JF&CS Chaplaincy Services, which provides baskets to inmates in jails.

"We also often help inmates' families," Winston said.

Last year, more than 10,000 people received packages, and NCJW expects that number to increase this year.

The project also helps Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee make seders for the homeless, Winston said.

While anyone who needs help gets it, Winston said, NCJW must have a referral from an agency, rabbi, doctor, educator or lawyer. People like that, she said, often know when a person or a family is going through a difficult time, even though no one else does.

Those wishing to help can bring food to the NCJW office at 4700 Bathurst St., or to depots in grocery stores around the GTA. Food must be non-perishable and have reputable and current Pesach hechshers.

Winston also urged people to keep in mind that children get the baskets too, and really enjoy getting treats such as chips, candy and cake. Sweets and coffee and tea are items that are often in short supply, although she said that, depending on who needs help in a given year, NCJW might run out of staples such as gefilte fish or cake meal.

For this reason, Winston said, NCJW also appreciates donations of money, which are tax deductible. "Our money goes farther, since we can get stuff in bulk from wholesalers. Plus we know what we need."

Packing of the baskets began earlier this week, and they will be delivered March 28.

Nothing is wasted, Winston said. Donated food that isn't appropriate for Passover – last year there were two tons of it – is donated to women's shelters or women who have just left shelters.

NCJW paper bags will be distributed with The CJN, and there will be information tables at many supermarkets to accept donations of food or money.

Montreal Vaad says it won't sanction OU 'leniencies'

The change, however, does not affect pre-packaged products sold at the retail level. Consumers will find the same matzah products on the shelves, Rabbi Emanuel said. The Vaad is not issuing any alert to consumers. "What's made under the OU is OK. At the retail level, there is no problem… There's nothing wrong with using it."

He said the Vaad has simply decided that when it comes to establishments it supervises, it must uphold the highest standards of kashrut so that even the most stringently observant Jews can feel comfortable with foods bearing its MK.

He said some other American kashrut supervisory bodies, such as New York-based OK and Star-K in Baltimore, have adopted a similar policy.

Rabbi Emanuel said the OU is allowing for certain "leniencies" permitted under Halachah, which the Vaad is not prepared to sanction.

It's not that products made this way are un-kosher for Passover, he said, it's just that they're "regular" matzah, as opposed to "18-minute."

The 18-minute matzah brands the Vaad accepts are made in Israel, and Rabbi Emanuel said there is "no shortage whatsoever."

Two weeks after the first letter, Rabbi Emanuel sent out a second letter that "regular" matzah from previous years that the manufacturers have in stock can be used until depleted. He also reminds them to make their order for approved products "immediately," as "time is running out for the importers to make these products available."

Rabbi Moshe Elefant, executive rabbinic co-ordinator of the OU's kashrut division, said the OU's requirement for certification is that matzah be baked within 18 minutes. It does not require that production be stopped every 18 minutes and the equipment dismantled and cleaned. He did not dispute the Vaad's assertion that no U.S. machine-made matzah meets this requirement.

> Pre-packaged matzah products sold in stores not affected by MK ban

"There are different interpretations of what is correct," he said, but would not otherwise comment on the Vaad's decision.

Kosher food industry consultant Bill Stubina said the Vaad's decision is unrealistic, inconsistent and makes little sense.

He said issuing the edict on Feb. 10 was too late to make compliance easy. The major bakery he works with, which supplies not only Montreal, but also Toronto and New York, begins Passover production three months before the holiday.

Secondly, matzah from Israel is much more expensive and, in any case, Stubina does not believe there is a sufficient amount available and some products, such as matzah rolls and balls, will be in short supply. He believes the Vaad's follow-up letter on Feb. 24 came as a result of him raising this issue.

But what bothers Stubina the most is the inconsistency of setting one standard for producers, with non-compliance meaning they will lose their MK hechsher – and not for consumers.

"The people the Vaad is trying to protect – the very religious – don't need it because they are not using these products anyway. But the ones who might want to know are not being told," he said.

"As a private citizen, I ask 'If it's not good enough for the manufacturers, why is it allowed in my home?'"

In addition, he can't understand how matzah that was acceptable for "years and years" is no longer good enough.

Moreover, Stubina contends that even the most strictly observed machine production cannot be completely cleaned because it is a conveyor system.

The Vaad has posted on its Web site a detailed article which was originally published four years ago by Rabbi Zushe Blech, a widely respected independent mashgiach in New York. It explains the finer points of matzah production and the halachic questions that have arisen since the advent of machines.

What he says, however, appears to contradict the Vaad's position.

Most machine-made matzah, Rabbi Blech writes, is produced on equipment that is cleaned thoroughly at the beginning of a production cycle, but not every 18 minutes.

This adheres to a Talmudic passage that says the time it takes dough to become chometz is longer if it is constantly being worked.

"These machine matzah factories therefore design their systems to keep the dough in a constant state of motion. Furthermore, the equipment is designed to prevent the dough from sticking to the equipment or otherwise remaining in the system for 18 minutes.

"Since the speed of the matzah production is such that every mixture of dough passes through the system into the oven well within 18 minutes, it can be assumed that all of the matzah has indeed been baked within 18 minutes of the time it was first kneaded. Any minor amount that might remain on the equipment would be halachically insignificant."

Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Toronto-based Kashruth Council of Canada, which issues the COR hechsher, said he has heard of the Vaad's decision but could not comment about its implication for Toronto producers, nor would he comment about his own organization's policy.

Masorti aims to bring Jewish content to secular Israelis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi David Golinkin wants nothing less than to revolutionize Israel's educational system.

The American-born, Jerusalem-based president of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies – a prolific writer and respected halachic authority in the Masorti (Conservative) movement – was in Toronto recently as part of a 2½-week North American fundraising tour.

Rabbi David Golinkin

In an interview at the offices of The CJN, Rabbi Golinkin outlined what he sees as a worsening "crisis in Jewish education" in Israel. "There is a tremendous gap between most Israelis and their own tradition."

Offering an example of the paucity of Jewish content in Israeli secular schools, he noted that this year, students at a school affiliated with Hebrew University chose a Christmas theme for their Chanukah party, including a Christmas tree and Santa Claus hats.

Also, he added, most Israeli kids in Tel Aviv mark their bar or bat mitzvah with a dance party instead of a religious ceremony.

Last September, Rabbi Golinkin said, Israel's Ministry of Education changed its core curriculum guidelines for secular schools, reducing mandatory Bible study from four hours a week to two.

The Masorti movement offers an alternative through its system of TALI schools, comprising 72 kindergartens and 53 schools serving elementary, junior high and high school students and sponsored by the Schechter Institute. Two TALI schools are identified with the Reform movement, the rabbi noted.

The first TALI school was established in 1976, when, "if you wanted serious Jewish education [in Israel] and you weren't Orthodox, the closest school was in Toronto," Rabbi Golinkin said.

"The purpose of the Schechter Institute," he said, "is to bring about a quiet revolution of Jewish education in the State of Israel, to restore Jewish studies to the 80 per cent of the population who go to secular public schools, [including] the masses who have made aliyah from the former Soviet Union."

The rabbi also sees the institute's rabbinical school and the 55 rabbis it has ordained so far as part of the endeavour. Although roughly half those rabbis work in Masorti synagogues, of which Israel has about 50, other rabbis are "trying to branch out" into areas such as local community centres that were "previously untouched by rabbis."

Most Israeli rabbis, unlike Schecter alumni, do not have a high school diploma, according to Rabbi Golinkin."There is a gap between rabbis in the field and the people they're trying to serve."

Another aspect of the Schechter Institute's multi-pronged approach to Jewish education in Israel involves an interdisciplinary post-graduate master's program in Jewish studies for teachers, Rabbi Golinkin said. The program is offered one day a week.

"We have 455 students, and 600 have already graduated – over 1,000 teachers, each teaching at least 30 children. That means our students and graduates are teaching more than 30,000 children every year."

The majority of funding for Schechter programs, including the TALI schools, comes from the Jewish Agency, Rabbi Golinkin said. The rest is from foundations, individuals and Jewish federations, he added. TALI schools receive some tax money, but not for their Jewish studies component.

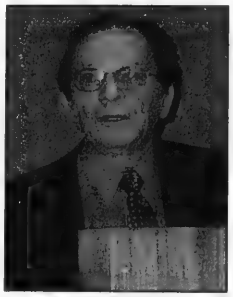
Seeking solutions for Toronto's Jewish vulnerable

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

A new model is in place today to help vulnerable members of Toronto's Jewish community, thanks to the Hope for Tomorrow Symposium, held earlier this year.

The symposium, chaired by Gordon Wolfe, included over 60 concerned members of the community who came together to map out a strategy based on three manageable initiatives designed to address the day-to-day issues faced by those living in poverty.



Gordon Wolfe

That new model – created by UJA Federation's Social Planning Committee and UJA's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative – is comprised of a community council, a volunteering/mentoring program, and a housing initiative.

"Through these three initiatives, we hope to take action and better the lives of our fellow Jews living at, or below, poverty levels in our city," says Wolfe. "These three projects are a small step in the right direction to diminish the impact of poverty even though we may never be able to eradicate it."

The formation of a community council, which will include all of Toronto's available agencies involved in assisting Jewish people living in poverty, will create access points for those in need, making it easier for them to take advantage of various services.

Through the volunteering/mentoring program, a bank of professionals with specific skills, willing to donate their time will be matched with those in need.

Under the housing initiative, members of the community council will go to landlords and developers offering them incentives to help those needing shelter.

"It is our goal to increase the availability of affordable housing for the Jewish community within the Bathurst Street corridor," says Paul Braun, chair of the housing committee. "We want to create this inventory from the existing housing owned by private landlords. The committee will work with the private sector to create a bank of rental apartment units, which will be affordable and sustainable on a long-term basis."

Included in the symposium was a panel made up of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) clients who spoke emotionally of their own personal experiences and needs.

Among participating UJA Federation partner agencies in the Hope for Tomorrow Symposium were JF& CS, JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto, Jewish Vocational Service, Kehilla Residential Centres, and Reena.

Ahavat Yisrael – Love for Israel!

By RABBI HOWARD MORRISON
Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue

I recently had the privilege of representing Toronto's Rabbinic community at the 10th annual Keren Hayesod Rabbinic Forum Conference in Jerusalem.

The conference, for rabbis from outside the U.S., brought together 30 of us from the proverbial "four corners of the earth" - Italy, France, Mexico, Venezuela, Argentina, Australia, South Africa, England and Switzerland. Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa, one of the conference organizers, also represented the Canadian rabbinate.

The one language that all the rabbis understood was Hebrew. How appropriate that a rabbinic conference in Jerusalem had virtually all of its lectures and informational briefings conducted in Hebrew. As Hebrew unites Jews from around the world, so too Hebrew united rabbis from around the world, who represented different streams of Jewish religious thought.

We took part in a series of briefings led by expert speakers covering topics such as the new security fence in Israel. The popular sentiment was that Arafat is the source of the fence, and that it divides democracy from anarchy; those who value life from those who would commit suicide.

An expert on hasbara (public relations) told us how Palestinians influence the media through intimidation, contriving the events that journalists cover and supplying media material for the world from unreliable Palestinian news sources. Unlike the coerced media of the Palestinians, Israel's media speaks with more than one voice. Israel offers a free press. We were encouraged to state Israel's position strongly and affirmatively.

At Kiryat Moriah's Institute for Jewish Studies, we watched a class of new immigrants serving in the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) who were studying conversion to Judaism. The Institute, financially supported by the Jewish Agency for Israel, UJA Federation's overseas partner, employs lecturers with diverse and pluralistic approaches representing the major streams of Jewish thought in a uniform and shared program.

About 60 per cent of the Institute's students are not registered as Jews. Graduates who finish their studies and are interested in conversion are referred to the Chief Rabbinate's special conversion courts. Since the Institute was founded, 3,289 students who were not registered as Jews expressed a desire to convert and began the process. Of these, 2,947 have finished their studies, and 1,153 of them have been converted to Judaism. All of the students were eligible to immigrate to Israel under the provisions of the Law of Return.

Rabbi Howard Morrison (2nd from far left), of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, joined 30 rabbis from around the world – excluding the U.S. – at the recent Keren Hayesod Rabbinic Conference in Jerusalem. Keren Hayesod is the fundraising arm of the Jewish Agency.

At the rabbinic forum conference, a pluralistic composition of 30 rabbis from around the world came together in Jerusalem. We learned Torah together; we prayed together; we visited sites together; and we built friendships with each other. All of the above was accomplished in the language of the Jewish people and in the spirit of Ahavat Yisrael – Love for Israel.

For the first time in more than 15 years, Dorit Cohen has been able to clearly see the faces of her three sons. By placing photographs of Aviram, 21, Ofir, 19 and Adam, 16 - under the electronic video magnification system given to her by the Jewish Agency - she is able for the first time ever to carefully scrutinize their features.

"They look so much older and so much more handsome than I imagined," observed Cohen as she exuded maternal pride.

Cohen, 51, from Yavne, south of Tel Aviv, suffers from deteriorating eyesight because of a genetic eye disorder. Even as a child growing up in Dimona from a family of Turkish immigrants she had problems seeing, and by first grade she wore glasses with thick lenses.

"I was one of seven children and we grew up in great poverty," she recounted. "The big tragedy is that corrective surgery would have been available when I was a child. But by the time I consulted ophthalmologists when I was older, they told me that the damage was irreversible."

In fact, using glasses, Cohen was able to get by sufficiently for many years. For 15 years she worked for the Jewish Agency before failing eyesight forced her to retire in 1987.

"It was a coincidence that the Jewish Agency – my former employer - gave me this gift," she explained.

The electronic video magnification system costs about $3,000 – a modest sum which is nevertheless well beyond her means. Cohen's husband, Avner, a former warehouseman, has been unemployed for more than three years.

The high-tech electronic video magnification system, which vastly magnifies whatever is placed on its platform, has opened up new horizons for Cohen.

"You cannot imagine the crises caused by not being able to see," she continued. "I remember a few years ago receiving a telegram when nobody was in the house. I sat there worried out of my mind thinking that somebody was dead. When my husband finally came home and read it to me, it turned out that it was a Mother's Day greeting from my son."

"After so many years of darkness," she said, "I now literally feel that there is some light at the end of the tunnel."

Eilat awarded for excellence in education

Students benefit from Toronto partnership

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

The Israeli city of Eilat – Toronto's "partnered community" through the Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative – is being awarded the prestigious Israel Prize for Education.

The annual honour will be presented to Pnina Ziv, head of Eilat's Educational Administration, in Jerusalem later this month by Israel's minister of education, Limor Livnat.

The educational system of Eilat currently accommodates more than 9,000 youngsters in eight day-care centres, 67 pre-kindergartens and kindergartens, 10 elementary schools, and four high schools.

Despite numerous government cutbacks, including a reduction in Eilat's education budget, the educational system developed several programs over the past few years thanks to P2K funding. Among them were initiatives enabling Eilat's teachers and students to improve their skills and training outside the classroom.

P2K funds also go toward focused curricula for underachievers, students with special needs, and gifted students.

Students at Eilat's Alon High School enjoy the gift of books they received from P2K Toronto and Eilat Young Leadership groups.

A teacher at Eilat's Alon High School, along with young leaders from Toronto and Eilat, explain the P2K partnership to the students.

As a result of these programs, the percentage of students eligible for matriculation diplomas in Eilat has more than doubled, rising from 27 per cent to 60 per cent.

"The true partnership and huge contribution of the Toronto Jewish community has made the operation of unique, significant and cutting-edge projects possible," says Ziv. "This contribution has enabled Eilat's educational system to take tremendous strides."

"We have many partners in our educational efforts, and the first among them is the Jewish community of Toronto," says the mayor of Eilat, Meir Yitzhak Halevi. "The Toronto community has led the way with its contributions to Eilat's educational system, which has helped to pave the way to achieve this vision. Each and every one of the partners in the educational family of Eilat is a blessed drop in the sea of achievement."

Other contributions to Eilat's school system - made through UJA Federation's 2003 Israel Emergency Campaign - funded additional security for kindergartens and schools, first aid courses for school staff and medical equipment for ambulances.

Sonshine seeks a louder voice for women

Perhaps it's the fact that Fran Sonshine was born to Holocaust survivors. Maybe it's because she spent the first five years of her life in Israel. Whatever the reason, Sonshine, incoming chair of UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy (WC&A), is anxious to roll up her sleeves and get started.

Fran Sonshine

Sonshine, a proponent of the "power in numbers" theory, feels that her major challenge will be to engage more Jewish women in UJA.

"Our Jewish community – as a whole - is one of the best anywhere," she says. "In terms of women, we have some of the most committed, passionate, and talented ones around. Still, I want to bring more women in, have them become educated to the issues that affect us. As individuals we may have a voice, but brought together, as one powerful entity, we have a roar. With anti-Semitism and anti-Jewish sentiment so prevalent today, we must be vigilant and we must be heard."

Sonshine brings an impressive resume to her new role with UJA. She is the past chair of the Baycrest Centre Foundation where she initiated the very first aannual campaign. She is a past president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, and currently a national vice president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO. She has also been actively involved with State of Israel Bonds and Aish Hatorah.

"It was incredibly flattering just to be asked by UJA," says Sonshine, a former elementary school teacher born in Cyprus. "I've been working in Toronto's Jewish community for my entire adult life, and I've been involved with UJA over the past 10 years, and yet, to have this new opportunity is a tremendous challenge, one that I can't wait to meet."

During the recently completed UJA Federation Campaign 2004, WC&A, chaired by Barbara Bregman, raised a record seven million dollars.

"They did just an absolutely tremendous job this past year, and I'm sure that this year's team will be inspired and motivated by that success. The torch has been passed," says Sonshine.

"The work we do at UJA Federation is so important for Jewish life today and in the future, in both Toronto and in Israel," she says. "What we do today directly affects our children and our children's children. What could possibly be more important than that? It's part of our role – as women – to educate our families, our children; it's our responsibility as Jewish women, as has been the case throughout history, to get things done."

Food for thought

Volunteers of Hands On Toronto, a program of UJA Federation's Young Adult Division, recently participated in a day full of mitzvah projects around the city. Pictured here are volunteers who rolled up their sleeves to help sort and package food at the Second Harvest Food Bank. Chairs of One Cool Day are Barry Barnett, Scott Greene, and Benjamin Mogil. Volunteer Sharlene Milgram (front row, 3rd from the left) put together the Food Bank initiative.

Rabbi holds hunger strike against anti-Semitism

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Rabbi Ross Singer, spiritual leader of Vancouver's Congregation Shaarey Tefilah synagogue, staged a three-day hunger strike last week to protest attacks against Jews in Israel and in the Diaspora.

"I wanted to get the word out to the non-Jewish world that there is a serious problem of worldwide anti-Semitism and that something needs to be done about it," Rabbi Singer said.

"People don't like to venture too far out of their boxes, especially about issues they don't know much about. Sometimes they need to be prodded, and that was my goal."

Rabbi Singer said he received offers from two supporters living in B.C.'s Lower Mainland to join him in the hunger strike, but he declined.

Rally raises over $400 to rebuild Istanbul synagogues

"I definitely didn't want to encourage anybody else to fast for three days," he said. "Before deciding to fast for three days, I had a full physical examination."

Rabbi Singer drank water during his fast and a doctor monitored his health.

His fast began at nightfall on March 1, two days before the Fast of Esther. Rabbi Singer said that when the Jews of the Persian empire faced extinction, Queen Esther called for Jews in the city of Shushan to fast before she asked the Persian king to spare their lives. The original fast lasted for three days, but today it is typically commemorated with a 12-hour fast from sunup to sundown.

Rabbi Singer said the goal of his fast was to highlight recent attacks worldwide against Jews, and to inspire Jews in the Lower Mainland and the rest of Canada to connect with other Jews during this year's 12-hour fast.

He said he got the idea for the hunger strike when two synagogues in Istanbul were attacked by terrorists in November 2003.

"I forgot about it, but when [Toronto native] Chezi Goldberg was murdered recently by a suicide bomber on a Jerusalem bus, I decided I had to do something," he said.

His hunger strike culminated in a rally in the late afternoon of March 4 outside the downtown Vancouver Art Gallery. The one-hour event attracted 80 Israel supporters, including members of the Friendship Circle, a group of pro-Israel Christians.

Rabbi Singer said the hunger strike and the rally "raised more than $400 for the rebuilding of the Istanbul synagogues, and the rally enabled us to express our pain about attacks against Jews."

A celebration of aliyah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

An Israel Aliyah Awareness Shabbat is being sponsored March 13 by the Mizrachi Organization of Canada; Tehilla, the Mizrachi aliyah division; and the Israel Aliyah Office of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Guest speakers who will address the congregations in most of the Orthodox synagogues in Toronto that day include Solly Sacks, director of World Mizrachi; Rabbi Ian Azizollohoff, director of Tehilla for North America; Yoske Shapira, former cabinet minister and chair of Tehilla, and Ido Katz, Jewish Agency shaliach for Orthodox aliyah.

A melaveh malka at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto at 9 p.m. will feature Israeli minister of housing and chair of the National Religious Party Effi Eitam, speaking on the importance of western aliyah.

Jack Kahn, president of Mizrachi of Canada, is an enthusiastic supporter of the project. "At recent meetings of the board of governors of the Jewish Agency, the subject of aliyah from the West was a major topic," Kahn said.

The board feels it is essential to encourage it "if the demographic situation in Israel is to continue to maintain its Jewish character."

Mizrachi appreciates "the enthusiastic support the rabbinic leadership of Toronto has given this special Shabbat," Kahn said.

The Jewish Agency and its chair, Salli Meridor, have endorsed the concept, the first of its kind in North America, Kahn said. "The hope is that other segments of the community, not only in Toronto but all over North America, will follow our lead and bring the subject of aliyah to the fore."

Strong support also comes from shaliach Gadi Anazi, Jewish Agency aliyah director for Toronto and Western Canada. Anazi said it is his "fervent wish that Mizrachi will demonstrate its commitment to promote aliyah as a primary means of support for Israel."

Kahn said the "flavour of Israel" will continue Mar. 17, with the Jerusalem Cantorial Choir, at Shaarei Shomayim.

For information or to reserve for the melaveh malka, call the Mizrachi office, 416-630-9266.

Torah dictum to pursue justice guides Cotler

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – When Irwin Cotler was sworn in as justice minister and attorney-general in December, he wore a kippah and attentive observers might have noticed him mumble something after stating his name. Those words were "son of Nat and Fay Cotler."

He had wanted to say them out loud, but was told no change could be made to the oath.

Both the head covering and tribute to his parents (his mother is 92 and in poor health) were a statement that Cotler, 63, remains true to where he came from as a devoted only child raised in traditional Judaism.

In fact, he has adopted the Torah's instruction "Justice, justice shall you pursue" as his credo.

Cotler has been a reluctant politician almost since the day he was elected MP for Mount Royal in a 1999 byelection and, in fact, made public his intention not to run again after his re-election in 2000. It was well-known he and his Israeli-born wife Ariela were considering moving to Israel, where a daughter lives.

What changed his mind, he said in an interview, was his experience as a member of the human rights subcommittee of the foreign affairs committee, hearing first-hand testimonies about the grave risk facing Africa due to disease, conflict, poverty and environmental degradation.

"I felt I had to lend my voice… I said I've got to do what I can… I went into politics not to be a bystander," he said.

At the Stockholm International Forum in January, Cotler spoke on the Rwandan genocide, which he calls preventable. "No one can say that we did not know about the incitement." He urged more co-operation among countries in warning of incipient mass atrocities and in prosecution of perpetrators.

He has been invited by the Rwandan president to the 10th anniversary commemoration in April.

In Canada, Cotler has made the pursuit of war criminals, both of the Nazi era and of more recent times, a priority. "I am putting war criminals on notice that they will not find sanctuary in this country. If we have not managed to keep you out, we will bring you to justice."

The dossier on Nazi war criminals has never been closed, he said, and the government remains committed to their pursuit, although he admits the long passage of time makes this difficult.

Cotler is staying mum on matters related to Israel and is guarded when asked about it. If the Jewish community had hoped they would have a strong advocate for Israel in cabinet, they are not likely to see evidence of it in public. (Justice is generally seen as among the six most senior portfolios.)

He said Israel is the responsibility of the foreign affairs minister, and Cotler has plenty to do as "legal adviser to the Crown and steward of justice policy," as well as representing a multicultural riding.

Within cabinet, he says he "can make a case," but he said the community should bear in mind that the Middle East is not "prominent on the radar screen. Ninety per cent of our agenda is domestic… but when it does come up, I will address it from the perspective I have always pursued."

One of the first Jewish organizations to directly petition him was the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center, which asked that he lend support to a campaign to have suicide bombings designated "crimes against humanity" by the United Nations.

"I regard suicide bombing as a crime against humanity, but I don't think there is a need for a particular international treaty. It is covered right now under international criminal law. It's a matter of enforcing it," he said.

Being a cabinet minister, he indicated, is about give-and-take, with each minister bringing their respective concerns to the table. "It's unfortunate we can't let the country into cabinet meetings. The level of debate is equal to that at an academic seminar."

Maintaining cabinet solidarity is likely the biggest challenge for Cotler, who has spent a lifetime speaking out.

Another priority of Cotler's is upholding Canada's anti-terrorism legislation, which he defends as promoting human rights, not infringing on them. "However, in its enforcement we must ensure equal application and not single out any group or individual." He is similarly adamant about the need to maintain effective hate-speech laws.

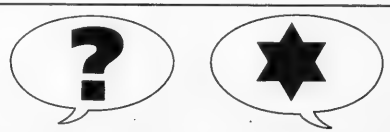
One of his pet projects as minister has been travelling around the country asking law students what they think the justice agenda should be.

One memorable meeting was in Nunavut with young aboriginals. He was intrigued by their suggestion of an aboriginal seat on the Supreme Court. Although he says he would not recommend such a designation, he does believe there is room for more consideration of aboriginal traditions in the justice system.

In February, Cotler tabled four bills, which he refers to as a "social rights basket," including the decriminalization of possession of small amounts of marijuana. "We strongly believe, much like a majority of Canadians, that while marijuana use must be discouraged – and remain illegal – it should not result in a criminal record for possession when small amounts are involved. We'll also be tougher on large-scale growing operations."

Cotler said he and the government remain committed to same-sex marriage as a matter of equal rights and that asking the Supreme Court for a reference on an additional fourth question, as he did in January – and thereby delaying the process – will allow for a more comprehensive picture of the issue and more time for debate and input by Canadians, who he said are divided.

The question is whether limiting common-law marriage to opposite-sex couples is constitutional, he added.



CONVERSATIONS ABOUT CONVERSION

A special 6 week course for those who have converted to Judaism or those considering conversion.

Explore the history and traditional texts on conversion, issues of acceptance, ethnicity, family and community, the myths around conversion, plus the lighter side of conversion. Team-taught by Rabbis and educators with special experience in the field.

Israeli ambassador gets mixed reception on Vancouver campuses

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada, got very different receptions during recent visits to the campuses of two Vancouver post-secondary institutions.

On March 2 at Langara College, noisy protesters repeatedly interrupted Divon's speech on Israeli current affairs, while a day later, at the University of British Columbia, he encountered a generally friendly and receptive audience.

According to Alexis Pavlich, Vancouver Hillel's director of Israel affairs, as he walked into the classroom that was booked for his Langara College speech, Divon encountered a group of students who heckled him and shouted anti-Israel slogans .

Shortly after he began speaking to a quiet audience of 20 to 30 students, the anti-Israel group in the hallway entered the classroom and continued its heckling.

"The room soon filled up to about 50 people," Pavlich says. "The anti-Israel group used their cellphones to call in friends from outside and the heckling and shouting got worse. One of them was swearing. The moderator asked the protesters to behave, but they ignored him. Essentially, they hijacked the ambassador's speech."

The next day, Divon had a much different experience when he spoke to a standing-room only audience of 120 at International House on the University of British Columbia campus.

Sponsored by the UBC Israel Advocacy Club and the Centre of International Relations, Liu Institute for Global Issues, Divon's speech was titled "Update on the Middle East." The 45-minute presentation on Israeli political history from 1947 to the present, which concentrated on Israel-Palestinian conflicts, was followed by a 45-minute question-and-answer session.

Hillel director Eyal Lichtmann said about half of the International House audience members were Israel supporters, with the rest split evenly between curious students and anti-Israel protesters.

"The protesters were few in number and quite civil," Lichtmann. "There was some heckling from the back of the hall, but RCMP and UBC campus security were on hand to make sure things didn't get out of hand. They were extremely professional and did an excellent job."

Recent UBC audiences have been noticeably friendlier to pro-Israel speakers than those at Langara.

Last Dec. 5, controversial U.S. academic Daniel Pipes spoke to a supportive audience of 400 at UBC's Student Union Building, but last November, just days after the college hosted a presentation titled "Why Israel is an Apartheid State," Langara's student government blocked an Israeli Bedouin from speaking about multiculturalism in Israel.

HAVING FUN WITH PURIM: The women's prayer group last week staged a costumed Megillah reading at the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in Montreal.

ש'שאר ב'נינו

גידי קורן וחברים

מה יהיה

שם טוב עלי שמו

חיי כלב

Ve'ahavta

Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee.

Is looking for a Director of Development/Fundraising

Ve'ahavta is Canada's only Jewish humanitarian and relief organization committed to Tikun Olam (repairing the world) in developing nations and here at home assisting the homeless (see www.veahavta.org).

If you have 5 years experience managing all aspects of a fundraising department, a thorough understanding of the Jewish community, experience canvassing at a top gifts level and a soulful spirit, please e-mail (mail@veahavta.org) or fax your CV (416-964-6582) to Avrum Rosensweig by March 26th. Salary is competitive and commensurate with experience. Phone calls will only be returned upon receipt of CVs reflecting the appropriate experience.

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is April 26th, 2004.

MP stands by comments

But the MP for London-Fanshawe said "members of the Jewish diaspora [also] used that phrase," including Norman Finkelstein, the controversial critic of Israel.

"If people of that calibre say it, I'm going to use that phrase in the House," he told The CJN.

O'Brien, who has served on a number of parliamentary committees, including foreign affairs and international trade, drew the ire of the Jewish community when he told parliament on Feb. 17 that the security barrier being constructed by Israel "denies basic human rights to the Palestinian people and further reduces the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to the status of concentration camps."

In a telephone interview, he said he had researched concentration camps prior to rising in the House.

He said he was surprised people assumed he was referring to Nazi-era concentration camps. "There were many concentration camps that pre-date the Nazis. Surely you're aware of that. They didn't invent them.

"I would never have equated the actions of the Sharon government, the incredibly unacceptable actions of the Sharon government, as bad as they are, with the Nazis," he said.

"I'm not using concentration camps as the Nazi camps. I'm using concentration camps in the generic sense. They predate the Holocaust by quite some time."

O'Brien said that in addition to Finkelstein's use of the phrase "concentration camps," an editorial in Catholic Insight, a Roman Catholic magazine, also employed the term.

Finkelstein is an American Jewish professor known for arguing that Jews and Jewish organizations exploit the Holocaust for money and political power, and as an ideological weapon to justify Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

O'Brien said he has received numerous calls of support, including from Canadian Jews, who agreed with his characterization. He said he received no complaints from London Jews until he met recently with members of the organized Jewish community.

Adler said O'Brien has "a substantial Muslim Arab population in his constituency and he says they brought things to his attention. He studied the security barrier and saw references elsewhere that it caused concentration camps."

In a subsequent letter to O'Brien, Adler pointed out that comparing the West Bank and Gaza to a concentration camp is "absolutely wrong." People who employ it "are either ignorant of what a concentration camp is, or they choose to be deliberately provocative."

In his letter to O'Brien, Adler stated, "Your remark [in the meeting] that 'not all concentration camps were as bad as the Nazis', I am sorry to say, is breathtaking in its foolishness... The fact you deliberately inserted those words makes it clear you intended to be offensive and hurtful."

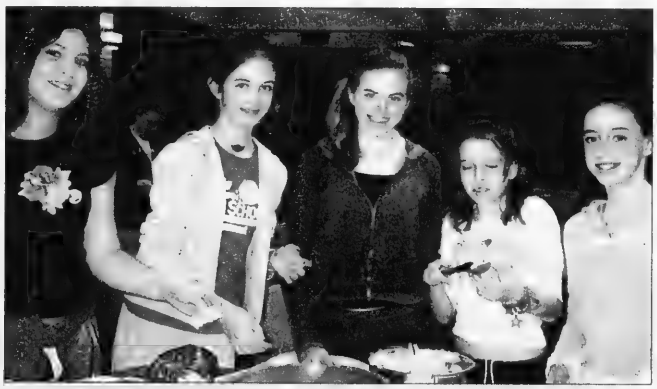
Peretz said the Jewish delegation went into the meeting hoping to determine whether O'Brien had been misinformed and would clarify his remarks.

However, the group came away with the impression that O'Brien had accepted the propaganda of his Arab constituents and was "not interested in learning anything."

Peretz said he does not believe O'Brien was interested in taking up a suggestion that he visit a Nazi concentration camp in Europe and then compare it to the situation in the Middle East.

With a federal election looming, political considerations seem to be motivating the MP, Peretz continued. The latest census data puts the Muslim population of London at about 11,000, compared to only 2,000 to 3,000 Jews. Moreover, "nobody here goes to an MP and tries to pester him or twist his mind to push a certain agenda. He said many people came to him from the Muslim community and complained to him and urged him to make a statement [about the barrier].

"It seems to me like there was a war of propaganda by people in the community against the Jewish community, and we're not participating in it."



HELPING THE HOMELESS: Students at Temple Emanu-El Religious School recently participated in a sandwich making blitz in support of Ve'ahavta's work with the homeless in Toronto. The sandwiches were distributed to the native men's residence operating "Street Help."

Why is the world focused on Israel?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Just about every pundit has written about Mel Gibson's movie The Passion of the Christ and how it may stir up anti-Semitic feelings. But Rex Murphy took a broader view in "Religion's lethal weapon" (Globe and Mail, Feb. 28), factoring in the role of today's virulent anti-Israel rhetoric: "The ferocity of criticism routinely directed at Israel, the 'routinization' of suicide-bombing of civilians in that country, the blistering use of Hitler analogies for Israeli leaders and reckless charges of Nazism toward the only community that as a community suffered the full murderousness of the real Nazis: These seem to me to have more solidity as a basis of anxiety over anti-Semitism than Mr. Gibson's filmic retelling of what has been cinematically retold many times before."

In its "Special report: Israelis and Palestinians" (Feb. 19); the Economist offered what amounts to a glaring understatement: "The struggle between Israelis and Palestinians has captured the world's imagination like no other."

The Economist writes, "It is not the death toll that sets it apart. Some 2,500 Palestinians and 900 Israelis have been killed during the Palestinian uprising, or intifadah, that started in 2000. That is terrible, but not much by, say, Congolese standards. What distinguishes the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is not the reality, grim though that is, but its symbolism. This is where the modern world's fault-lines meet: divides between rich and poor, secular and religious, Islam and the West."

The magazine goes on to enumerate more reasons for the world's continuing fascination with Israel. But it avoids the central issue – that Israel is the Jewish state – which is a rub for many people, including some prominent Jewish academics of a distinctly post- or anti-Zionist bent, who, like New York University professor Tony Judt, are forever transfixed by Israel's alleged sins, to the exclusion of any of its decencies and the real threats it faces – threats not of its own making.

Much like British historian Arnold Toynbee used to contend that the Jews are a fossil, Judt has argued that Israel – the sovereign embodiment of much of the world's Jewry – is an embarrassing anachronism whose policies fuel anti-Semitism.

"The depressing truth," Judt wrote in the New York Review of Books (Oct. 23, 2003), "is that Israel today is bad for the Jews." Israel's most severe non-Jewish critics lap up this kind of material with relish, especially when it appears in such a prestigious publication.

Other Jewish critics, though they are Zionists, dwell almost entirely on the negative points about Israel. Henry Siegman, for example (one of his many articles includes "Israel: The Threat From Within," the New York Review of Books, Feb. 26), allows his strong political opposition to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon get to the point where he becomes so preoccupied with Israel's shortcomings and alleged misdeeds that he pays virtually no attention to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and the PA's horrific records of abuse and failure. The onus for change falls on Israel's shoulders alone, critics such as Siegman believe, as if it were operating in a vacuum.

Proportionate, fair-minded criticism of Israel – including self-criticism by Israelis – is to be expected, even healthy. But an unhealthy line is crossed when the criticism turns into a one-sided obsession.

Many people expect more from Jews than from any other people and then chastise them in almost equal measure when they either overachieve (resentment) or fall short (Schadenfreude – relishing others' failures). Jews – who account for a negligible proportion of the world's population (about 0.2 per cent) but are almost mysteriously at the centre of so much of the world's consciousness – have rarely been treated with any degree of normalcy, to say the least.

Only very recently, with so much media attention focused on the almost daily attacks in Iraq and the tragic loss of civilian life there, have we seen more proportionate attention paid to Israel. But the negative tendencies mentioned above never stray far from the surface.

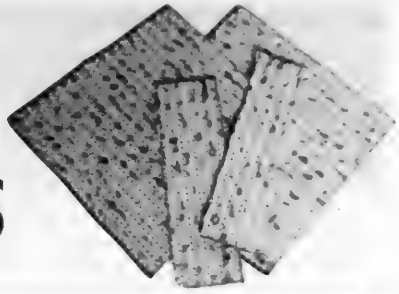
Passover Food Ideas



Chag kasher v'samayach

As winter eases its frosty grip, our thoughts naturally turn to the springtime festival of Passover.

In Jewish households around the world, people start making lists, preparing for the eight days in which we celebrate the ancient Hebrews' liberation from slavery more than 3,000 years ago.

A large part of the preparation is centred around food. Since Passover meals are different from those we serve the rest of the year, we savour our favourites and serve them Passover after Passover.

We may compare our recipes for charoset, our methods of making matzah balls or our tips for preparing a tender brisket, but in many cases we still cook what we've always cooked.

Memories play a large part in the Passover celebration and by eating foods that we remember from years past, we contribute to those warm memories.

Without discounting how our mothers or grandmothers prepared a certain dish, however, we sometimes want to get a bit creative.

We swap recipes with our friends and family, and we may take a little from one recipe and a little from another until we've created our own masterpiece.

Circumstance may also prompt us to add to our repertoire. We may have a vegetarian daughter, a diabetic parent or a guest with specific allergies or food sensitivities.

At The Canadian Jewish News we want to help you in that quest for new recipes, or for old recipes with a new twist. In the upcoming weeks, our writers will share with you some of their family favourites and some of their own creative efforts.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a chag kasher v'samayach.

Cook up a Sephardi feast for the seder

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

This Sephardi dish, although seemingly long, is actually very easy to put together and can be made up to one day ahead. Once rewarmed, serve scooped into the popovers. Eight stalks of celery may be substituted for the fennel.

CHICKEN TAGINE WITH SPRING VEGETABLES

3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
16 bone-in, skinless chicken thighs
1 tsp. each salt and pepper
3 large onions, chopped
¾ cup kosher for Passover white wine
8 large cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. grated lemon rind
1 tbsp. kosher for Passover ground coriander
2 tsp. sweet paprika
1½ tsp. each ground cumin and ground ginger
2 tbsp. dried mint
1 tbsp. dried dillweed
¼ tsp. cayenne pepper
⅓ cup chopped fresh coriander or parsley
5 large carrots, peeled and cut into 1-in. chunks
2 large fennel bulbs, trimmed and cut into chunks
½ cup large raisins (or ½ cup halved dates)
4 cups chicken broth
2 tbsp. tomato paste
2 tbsp. potato starch
fresh mint and coriander sprigs

In large Dutch oven or large soup pot, heat 2 tbsp. of oil over medium-high heat. Sprinkle chicken with half of salt and pepper. In batches, brown chicken. Remove to plate.

Add remaining oil; reduce heat to medium. Stir in onions. Cook, stirring, for about 10 minutes. Pour in ½ cup of wine. Cook, stirring to scrape up any brown bits from bottom of pan, until onions have absorbed all of the wine. Add garlic, lemon rind, ground coriander, paprika, cumin, ginger, mint, dillweed, fresh coriander and remaining salt and pepper. Cook, stirring, for about 5 minutes or until softened.

Add carrots, fennel and raisins to pan. Stir in chicken broth, remaining wine and tomato paste. Bring to a boil. Return chicken thighs to pan. Reduce heat and simmer covered for about 25 minutes or until juices run clear when chicken is pierced with a fork. Remove cover; cook for about another 15 minutes or until all vegetables are tender.

Remove vegetables and chicken to platter and tent with foil to keep warm. Boil juices in pan for about 10 minutes or until thickened. Scoop out ¼ cup of broth; whisk in potato starch. Stir potato starch mixture back into pan; boil, stirring, for 2 minutes. Pour sauce over chicken and vegetables. (Make ahead: cool slightly, cover with foil and refrigerate for up to 24 hours. Reheat over low heat.)

Serve garnished with fresh mint and dill. Makes 8 servings.

LEEKS WITH WARM THYME VINAIGRETTE

This lovely dish can be served as an appetizer, with two halves on a plate or as part of a larger meal. Conveniently, it can be made ahead. Place all the leeks on a plate, drizzle the vinaigrette over, wrap and refrigerate for up to 24 hours. Simply reheat in a microwave until the leeks are lukewarm and the vinaigrette has liquefied.

8 leeks (about 3½ lbs.)
2 tsp. olive oil

Vinaigrette:
¼ cup extra virgin olive oil
1 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1 tsp. kosher for Passover Dijon mustard
1 tsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1 tsp. dried thyme
½ tsp. each salt and pepper

Cut off dark green tops of leeks, so that only the white and very light green parts are left; trim root end. Cut leeks in half lengthwise. Rinse well under cold running water to wash away any sand. In large non-stick skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat.

Add leeks; cook, turning once, for 3 to 5 minutes or until just starting to turn golden. Pour in ½ cup water. Reduce heat to medium-low, cover and cook for about 15 minutes or until leeks are tender. Drain. Transfer to serving platter.

Meanwhile, in small microwaveable bowl, whisk together olive oil, vinegar, mustard, lemon juice, thyme, salt and pepper. Warm in microwave at high (100 per cent) for 45 seconds or until warm. Whisk to recombine. Pour over leeks. Makes 8 servings.

PASSOVER POPOVERS

To transform these into a sweet vehicle for mousse, sorbet or ice cream, simply add 2 tbsp. of granulated sugar to the water mixture before bringing it to a boil.

1 cup water
½ cup vegetable oil
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. dillweed
1 cup matzah cake meal
4 eggs

In saucepan, bring water, oil and salt just to a boil. Remove saucepan from heat. All at once, add matzah cake meal and dillweed, stirring with a wooden spoon. Return saucepan to heat; cook, stirring, for 1 minute. Remove from heat again; let cool for 5 minutes.

With either wooden spoon or electric mixer, beat in eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition.

Passover Food Ideas

Fresh Passover ideas to please any palate

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Sue Epstein moved to Israel in 1984, but originally hails from Atlanta, Ga., where she taught cooking classes and studied with Julia Child, Perla Meyers and other professional chefs. She has spent many years catering small parties and large affairs where success is measured by the quality and quantity of dishes prepared at affordable prices.

In Budget Cooking, Elegant Dining (Pitspopany Press/Devora Publishing, $19.95 US), Epstein shares her budgeting and culinary secrets on presenting food tastefully. Her book offers a vast array of Jewish holiday recipes that are both simple to prepare and elegant. Every recipe has a "Notes" section so that you can write in your own creative ideas. Her hints will show you how to substitute ingredients and create fresh ideas that will please any palate.

Budget Cooking, Elegant Dining provides common sense information on how to budget your meals, the best way to use leftovers and how to create menu plans that will work. You'll discover how to create a bar/bat mitzvah reception at an affordable price, how to honour the bride and groom with a Sheva Brachot they'll never forget and how to prepare affordable delicious dishes for the major Jewish holidays, including Passover.

"Because of the exacting requirements for keeping kosher during Passover and the large number of holiday meals, it is the most difficult time to stay on a budget," Epstein says. "In fact, it's almost impossible! The most you can hope for is to try and keep things within reason. My best suggestion is to stick to fresh fruits and vegetables as much as possible. Because Passover occurs in the spring, fresh fruits and vegetables are generally plentiful and inexpensive. It's easy to plan your menus around these foods and it's a great way to economize during Passover."

When planning your seder menu, keep in mind that most traditional Jews eat specified amounts of matzah, carpas, charoset, etc., during the seder itself.

When it is time for the festive meal, everyone is usually so full that it's difficult to eat a huge meal and stay awake for the remainder of the seder.

Epstein suggests that the first thing you do is photocopy the Passover recipes in her cookbook (or any of your cookbooks) and put them away with your Passover items. That way you won't have to worry about using a chametz cookbook during Passover – and you won't waste time looking for your Passover recipes either.

There are so many traditions on Passover, that you have to be careful about what recipes you use. For example, those who don't eat kitniyot (legumes) on Passover must be careful about rice recipes, while those who don't eat gebrocht (matzah or matzah products that have been moistened) should be careful about recipes that call for the addition of water to matzah meal. There are Using soup spoon, drop large balls of batter onto parchment paper-lined cookie sheet. Bake in centre of preheated 400 oven until puffed, golden and crisp, about 30 minutes. (Can be made up to 24 hours ahead and recrisped in a 350-degree oven). Makes 16 popovers.

RASPBERRY RHUBARB CRISP

Feel free to use any combination of fruit you have on hand, although this will affect the amount of sweetener you use and the amount of thickener. You need about 7½ cups of fruit to fill an 8-in. square baking dish.

Raspberry Rhubarb Filling:
5 cups chopped rhubarb, fresh or frozen and thawed
2½ cups frozen raspberries, thawed (or strawberries)
¾ cup granulated sugar
1 tsp. grated lemon rind
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
½ tsp. kosher for Passover cinnamon
4 tsp. potato starch

Crisp Topping:
¾ cup potato starch
⅓ cup matzah cake meal
⅓ cup packed kosher for Passover brown sugar pinch cinnamon
⅓ cup melted unsalted margarine

Preheat oven to 350. In large bowl, toss together rhubarb, raspberries, sugar, lemon rind and juice, cinnamon and potato starch until fruit is well coated. Transfer to square 8-in. baking dish. Set aside.

In separate bowl, stir together potato starch, matzah meal, brown sugar and cinnamon. Pour melted margarine over, tossing with fork until loose and crumbly. Sprinkle topping evenly over fruit. Bake in centre of oven for about 45 minutes or until fruit filling is bubbling and thickened and topping is golden. Makes 8 servings.

Wondrous plates of food that go on and on even customs concerning the types of matzah one eats: some people eat only hand-baked shmurah matzah, matzah that has been carefully watched from the time the wheat was cut, to make sure water was not dropped on it, while others are just as happy with the regular machine matzah.

But despite the different customs, at the seder table everyone joins together to remember the experience of the Exodus. Part of that experience is the wondrous plates of food that seem to go on and on, despite the late hour and drooping eyelids. These memories leave a taste in our mouths and our hearts that stays with us as long as we live.

Here are some of Epstein's family favourites for Passover from Budget Cooking, Elegant Dining that are both economical and easy. Her Passover Vegetable Kugel makes a scrumptious side dish and is also suitable for vegetarians. Matzo Cheese Kugel makes a wonderful dairy meal and her Kisses are sure to bring reciprocal kisses from your family!

PASSOVER VEGETABLE KUGEL

2 tbsp. oil
2 large onions, chopped
2 lbs. yellow squash, chopped or grated
2 large carrots, chopped or grated
1 lb. mushrooms, sliced
2 large potatoes, grated
4 eggs
½ tsp. garlic powder
1 tbsp. parsley flakes
1½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
⅓ cup matzah meal

Preheat oven to 350. Saute onions in oil until soft but not brown. Strain other vegetables, except mushrooms, squeezing to get as much liquid out as possible.

Combine onions and vegetables; add eggs, seasoning, salt, pepper and matzah meal. Pour into a well-greased casserole and sprinkle with paprika. Drizzle a little additional oil over casserole and bake for 1 hour, or until brown on top. Makes 8 servings.

MATZO CHEESE KUGEL

6 matzot, broken into large pieces
5 eggs, beaten
1 cup milk
1 lb. cottage cheese
1 tsp. salt
¼ cup sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
3 tbsp. margarine, melted
1 pint (2 cups) sour cream

Combine eggs with milk and beat well. Mix thoroughly with cottage cheese, salt, sugar, cinnamon and melted margarine.

In a greased 1½-quart baking dish, arrange 3 of the matzot. Pour half the cheese mixture over them. Repeat with remaining cheese mixture and matzot.

Bake at 350 for 40 minutes or until set. Serve topped with sour cream. Makes 6 servings.

STRAWBERRIES IN ORANGE JUICE

Lush, ripe strawberries served with fresh orange juice won't need sugar. The colours look lovely together and the taste is unforgettable.

4 fresh ripe strawberries per serving
½ cup fresh orange juice per serving

Just before serving, wash and hull the strawberries. Place in stemmed glasses or dessert bowls.

Pour fresh chilled orange juice over strawberries and serve.

KISSES

These kisses are Epstein's family's favourite Passover dessert. "If I made 600 of them," she says, "it still wouldn't be enough. It's probably the most economical dessert you can serve."

4 egg whites
¼ tsp. salt
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla

Beat egg whites and salt until stiff and dry. Beat in sugar gradually, 2 teaspoons at a time. Add vanilla and beat until mixture holds its shape. Spoon or pipe through pastry tube onto a cookie sheet lined with parchment paper, or a cookie sheet which has been greased and covered with greased brown paper. Bake at 250 for 50 minutes, or until golden. Watch carefully the last 10 minutes to make sure they don't turn brown. Makes 60 kisses.

Variation: This mixture may also be piped out as shells and filled with fruit.

Student finds humour for his cable show

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — While thousands of graduating high school students and their families in Ontario experienced heightened stress and anxiety over last year's "double cohort," Paul Telner saw humour and a chance at television stardom.

In mid-February, his half-hour comedy series Campus Cram debuted on Zilo Networks, a cable channel and Internet service aimed at university students that is the largest of its kind in the United States.

Shot on location at Ottawa colleges and universities, the show features Telner, who has been doing stand-up comedy since he was in high school, in a variety of humorous scenes. The basic premise is that all the campuses are overcrowded and understaffed, and Telner attempts to "help out" in various comical ways.

Telner graduated from Carleton University last November with a degree in film studies and is studying scriptwriting at Algonquin College, but he has already had years of hands-on media and entertainment experience.

He met his friend and future business manager Byron Pascoe while the two were grade 9 students at Ottawa's Sir Robert Borden High School.

"In Grade 11, Paul did Yuk Yuk shows and I was his comedy manager and I brought in people to watch him and tried to get him gigs," said Pascoe, now a business student at Wilfred Laurier University in Waterloo, Ont.

"We even made a promotional video. Then, in Grade 13, we did the [Ottawa] Fringe Festival. We did a Toronto Jewish comedy festival. We started our own company and have been working together for seven years."

Not bad for two young men barely into their 20s!

In the spring of 2002, while his parents thought he was packing his bags for a summer job at camp, Telner made an astonishing contact over the Internet.

Paul Telner, left, and Byron Pascoe

"One night at about 2 a.m., I sent an e-mail to Fox [Television] telling them all about myself, and they replied within 24 hours!" Telner said. "They were definitely interested. I called the next day and got a job as an intern in 'development.'"

Amazingly, the offer was genuine and Telner abandoned his camp plans to spend the summer in Los Angeles working at Fox. While there, he chronicled his adventures in a column for a local Ottawa community newspaper.

"It was almost like a reality show – the best summer of my life," he said. "I knew that was my life!"

Back in Ottawa, Telner produced a late night television show at Carleton which, he said, "turned my life around and told me that I have a future in television."

With the debut of Campus Cram, it seems that future is now.

Pro-Palestinian group on probation at McMaster

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The McMaster University chapter of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) was placed on probation by the university's student union last week because of a picture on the SPHR web site including a placard stating that "Zionism is racism."

Avi Ben-Zvi, director of Zionists at McMaster, which was placed on probation in November for an anti-Palestinian e-mail the group distributed (but did not write), noted several differences between the two sanctions.

The SPHR does not have a Jew monitoring them, he said, referring to the Zionist group's appointed monitor, Saeed Ally, executive adviser to the Muslim Students' Association and the McMaster Student Union's religious clubs chair.

Also, he said, the SPHR has said repeatedly that Zionism is racism, but the Zionists at McMaster e-mail that triggered its probation was a "one-time thing" from which the group disassociated itself.

Cale Zavitz, who imposed the sanctions in his capacity as MSU clubs administrator, could not be reached for comment before The CJN's deadline.

But he told the Hamilton Spectator that SPHR was put on probation because the club distributed e-mails and leaflets making and defending the statement "Zionism equals racism," and "in doing so, they have taken an active role."

Palestinian speaker criticizes Israel in Ryerson U address

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Mustafa Barghouthi, a Palestinian activist and medical doctor from Ramallah, simply couldn't compete with the Academy Awards when it came to drawing a crowd.

Speaking to a sparse and largely middle-aged, grey-haired audience at Ryerson University Feb. 29, the same night as the Oscars, Barghouthi outlined his vision of how a Palestinian state can become a reality: through international solidarity with Palestinians against "the wall" and the Israeli occupation, and through internal democratization of existing Palestinian institutions.

"We have to drive Israel to a situation where the price of occupation is too high. Only then will we see a change in Israeli attitude," he said.

Barghouthi's speech, which was sponsored by the group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, was advertised as a talk on "Democratic Alternatives for Palestine," but he devoted only the last 10 minutes of his hour-long presentation to his set topic.

For the first 50 minutes, he described the problems facing Palestinians: Israel's security barrier, unemployment, shortage of medical care, high fatality rates and checkpoints.

"The fact that some Israelis are dying in this conflict doesn't mean that the Israeli side and the Palestinian sides are equal," he said.

He compared the intifadah to the independence movement in Algeria in 1962, adding that in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict,"there is no peace process."

But when the audience applauded that statement, Barghouthi glared into the crowd. "I don't want to celebrate the absence of peace," he said.

One side can't live in security without the other having the same, he added. "There is no way you can achieve security in isolation without peace itself."

Barghouthi also criticized the barrier Israel is building between itself and Palestinians in the West Bank, calling it the "new Berlin Wall" and the "most recent instrument for land expansion and appropriation."

He said his ultimate vision is a free and democratic Palestine with freedom of expression and participation. He emphasized that the first step is building a mass struggle against the barrier beyond what has already been seen. He also pointed to Jewish youth who refuse to do army duty in Gaza and West Bank as examples to follow.

"I think what they are doing to the Jewish people is terrible. Either you support [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon and you're an occupier, or you are an anti-Semite like the rest of us, or you're a self-hating Jew," he said.

"He's speaking to the converted. The people here already support him, so he's not telling them anything they don't already know." Despite the venue – a lecture hall with about 150 seats – few students came to hear Barghouthi speak, she noted.

Viktor Vitebski, a Hillel member who was also at the speech, said he was upset by some of Barghouthi's comments, even if they were made in the context of being politically outspoken.

"He's not appreciating that anti-Semitism exists in the real form… It gives true anti-Semites an excuse to be anti-Semitic."

Vitebski also said many of Barghouthi's facts and statistics were either "exaggerated or flat-out lies," such as an allegation that Israel rejected the United Nations partition of British Mandatory Palestine in 1948.

"Pretty much the only positive thing out of [Barghouthi's] speech was his support for the creation of a sovereign Palestinian state beside Israel," he said.

WOLFOND CENTRE OPENS: The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life opened its doors on the University of Toronto's downtown campus last week, offering its 4,500 Jewish students a new home away from home. The 12,000-square-foot, $4.5 million facility will provide educational and cultural programming run by Hillel of Greater Toronto. On opening day, students toured the new facilities (top photo), made sandwiches for the needy as part of a Hillel social action program (bottom photo), and heard a briefing by Bret Stephens, editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Post. The centre is a UJA Federation Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative.

Hamas threatens retaliation after IDF kills 15

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Fifteen Palestinians were killed, including four children under the age of 16, and more than 80 Palestinians were wounded during an Israel Defence Forces (IDF) operation in two refugee camps in central Gaza Sunday.

Other than the children, all of the dead were armed men. They included nine Hamas members, one member of Fatah's Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades and one member of the Popular Resistance Committees.

Five people were seriously injured, including a 13-year-old boy and a woman, and 15 sustained moderate injuries. The rest were lightly injured.

The Palestinian Authority denounced the operation, calling it "a massacre for whose consequences Israel will be responsible." It urged the UN Security Council to send observers to the territories to protect the Palestinians.

Meanwhile, Hamas and Islamic Jihad both threatened retaliatory attacks against Israel. Hamas published a statement Sunday evening saying "[Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon will pay a heavy price, God-willing, and will leave the Gaza Strip vanquished and defeated."

On Saturday, six Palestinians were killed during a failed assault by terrorists in fake Israeli army jeeps at the Erez junction in northern Gaza. Hamas, Islamic Jihad and al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades said they carried out a joint strike and pledged more attacks.

But military sources said Sunday's raid was planned weeks in advance and was not connected to Saturday's botched suicide assault. Reports Sunday said the IDF planned to re-open the Erez junction and the industrial zone, which were closed after the attack, this Tuesday since the army feared closing it would encourage thousands of Palestinian workers to join terror groups.

IDF Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon told reporters during a tour of the Erez crossing on Sunday he could not rule out the possibility that the recent increase in the number of attacks is connected to talk about Israel's planned withdrawal from the territories.

Israeli commentators have speculated the army would step up operations against terror groups in the Gaza Strip before Sharon puts into motion a plan to evacuate Jewish settlements in the area.

Dozens of armoured military vehicles took part on Sunday in the pre-dawn hunt for terrorists in the Bureij and Nuseirat camps in central Gaza. With at least two Apache helicopters hovering overhead, Israeli forces moved slowly down alleys and side streets. Sniper units were stationed on rooftops, witnesses said.

Israeli government spokesperson Avi Pazner told the Associated Press, "Terrorism is pouring out of this refugee camp, and we have to stop it. We believe that by doing so we have prevented acts of terror in Israel and saved many human lives."

An Israeli military source said, "This is a pinpoint operation against the terrorist infrastructure in the central Gaza Strip. Five gunmen approached our forces, who shot them."

During the operation, dozens of anti-tank missiles and at least one bomb were fired at Israeli troops, the army said.

The source said terrorists in the area have been attacking Israeli convoys and firing mortar bombs and Qassam rockets at Jewish settlements.

In Nuseirat, soldiers surrounded the homes of two leaders of the Popular Resistance Committees, an umbrella group of members of several terror factions. By mid-morning, the army had redeployed in farms around the camp.

In the West Bank, troops blew up an explosives lab near Jenin on Sunday, after finding mortars, gunpowder and materials for preparing bombs in it, Israel Radio reported.

Canadian youths help victims of terror attacks

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — When the siren went off around 8:30 a.m. on Sunday, Feb. 22 at the Magen David Adom ambulance station in the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Pisgat Ze'ev, 18-year-old Joey Lightstone from Toronto was one of the first responders to hop on an ambulance bound for Liberty Bell Park, where just a few moments before, a suicide bomber with the Fatah Al Aksa Martyrs Brigade blew himself up on the number 14A bus, killing eight passengers and injuring more than 60 others.

"When we got to the scene, I immediately jumped out of the ambulance," says Lightstone, who came to Israel this past December to volunteer for six months before beginning his studies at York University.

"The scene was surreal. I had always been aware of the terror attacks being carried out in Israel. But actually being there and seeing people and seeing limbs and mangled bodies made that knowledge so much more personal."

Lightstone ran to a medic who was treating a soldier who had been badly injured in the blast.

"I put a neck brace on him and helped the medic to get him onto a spinal board, and together, we put him into the ambulance," says Lightstone, who then drove with the patient to Sherut Tzedek Hospital.

The current group of MDA volunteers in Jerusalem

"It was only in the ambulance that I got a good look at the soldier," he says. "He had some severe injuries on his leg, which I began to bandage like mad in an effort to stop the bleeding."

After dropping the patient off at emergency, the ambulance returned to the station.

"I started thinking it might as easily have been my brother, who is also a soldier," says Lightstone. "I got choked up when I realized the patient could have been a member of my own family."

In the meantime, 18-year-old first responder Hayden Rubensohn from Calgary was dropping a patient off at the hospital when his ambulance was summoned to the scene of the attack.

"We arrived 10 minutes after the blast," says Rubensohn, who said medics already had the situation under control by then.

"I jumped out of the ambulance and found a patient who needed his hand bandaged, so I helped with that."

Both Lightstone and Rubensohn were also on the scene of the attack on Jerusalem's number 19 bus at the corner of Gaza and Arlozorov streets in Rehavia on Jan. 29, after a Palestinian policeman from Bethlehem blew himself up, killing 11 people and leaving more than 50 wounded.

"That attack was harder for me because it was my first one," says Rubensohn, who arrived to Israel on Feb. 18 on a trip with friends.

"It was a big shock. I found myself on the scene, almost paralyzed. I was like, 'What is going on, is this reality?' I knew what to do training-wise, but to take in the whole scene was a different story."

Lightstone's first experience on the scene of a terror attack was also on Jan. 29. But because there were not enough flak jackets to go around, he had to wait in the ambulance.

"Within 45 seconds, a patient was brought into the ambulance," says Lightstone. "We did what we could to treat her, then dropped her off at Hadassah University Hospital.

"That first time, I didn't see the destruction that was caused. I only saw one patient. The second attack hit me a lot harder."

Lightstone and Rubensohn are among eight Canadians in a 70-member foreign volunteer team currently serving in the joint Jewish Agency-MDA Yochai Porat Overseas Volunteers Program.

At first, the 13-year-old program consisted exclusively of Canadian volunteers. But in 2001, Porat, an army medic and the Jewish Agency co-ordinator of the program who was killed in a March 2002 terrorist attack at age 26, extended the program to include people from around the world.

Since then, it has grown each year. In 2000, 47 people came from abroad to participate. By 2003, there were 328. This year, some 350 volunteers are expected to serve.

Each volunteer undergoes an initial 60-hour first aid training course, an intense eight days of learning how to bandage a simple wound, perform CPR and deal with mass casualty incidents, in order to become certified as a first responder.

First responders then join the ranks of MDA's 7,000-member permanent volunteer base of first responders, paramedics and physicians for the subsequent two months, during which time they are placed at a station five times per week on eight-hour shifts.

"I think it's an amazing accomplishment that such an efficient and effective ambulance service exists, which is comprised primarily of volunteers, especially in a country like Israel, where big things happen all the time," says Lightstone.

"People just go out and do it because it makes them feel like they are doing something for the country and its people, and that is something which I don't think you can find anywhere else in the world."

"A lot of volunteers say they feel as though they are doing a lot of good," says the Jewish Agency co-ordinator of the program, Yael Quinn.

"I would recommend the program to all Canadians," says Lightstone, who is now considering switching his university major from history and politics to paramedicine.

"I feel really, really good after every call I get – that I have helped somebody, that I helped save their life, that I helped to get them to the hospital faster, that I helped to make them more comfortable – just that I helped them, and that's a beautiful feeling."

Rubensohn adds, "There are hard moments, but at the end of the day, when you look back at what you've done – whether small or big – you have made a contribution to the State of Israel and that feels really good."

The Jewish Agency-MDA Yochai Porat Overseas Volunteers Program is now accepting applications for its upcoming course cycle, which begins July 1. For more information, visit www.magendavidadom.org/jafi.asp.

White House likes Sharon plan

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's proposals on withdrawing from Gaza and the West Bank "have the potential to be historic," the White House said. National Security Council spokesperson Shawn McCormack spoke after two top Sharon aides briefed U.S. officials last week on the status of the plan. McCormack said U.S. officials would soon visit Israel to further the plan.

Britain's conditional support

Britain would support Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza as long as settlers are not relocated to the West Bank. British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw informed Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom of Britain's position in a meeting in London last week. Shalom visited London as part of an intensive diplomatic campaign by Israel to counter foreign skepticism about Sharon's unilateral disengagement plans.

Turkey to supply water

Israel signed an agreement to get water from Turkey. Under the agreement, signed March 4, Israel will import 50 million cubic metres of water per year from Turkey for a 20-year period. The amount would constitute three percent of Israel's drinking water. Finding sources of water in the parched Middle East has long been a concern.

Gunned down in Gaza

A Palestinian journalist and loyalist to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat was gunned down in Gaza City. Palestinian police had no immediate suspects in the slaying of Khalil Zebin, 59, outside his office March 2. The killing comes amid increasing evidence of lawlessness in Palestinian-populated areas. Palestinian journalists have increasingly come under attack in Gaza by gangs believed to be linked to Arafat's Fatah movement, who are unhappy with media criticism of the dominant faction. Arafat called the incident a "filthy assassination."

War on apathy

Israeli soldiers are receiving crash courses in Zionism. Last week, the army said its education corps had been authorized to inculcate Zionism and other Jewish values in courses throughout the armed services. The Israeli army's chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, said the initiative, co-ordinated with the Jewish Agency for Israel, would boost morale and fight apathy among soldiers.

Not child's play

An Israeli military court convicted three would-be terrorists, ages 12, 13 and 15. The three boys from a Palestinian village near Nablus were found guilty of belonging to Islamic Jihad and planning an attack on the nearby Israeli city of Afula. They were arrested last week while preparing homemade guns.

Israeli Jew arrested for bombings

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

HAIFA — Just as Jews prepared to celebrate Purim, whose story culminates in the Jews' slaying of their enemies, one Israeli Jew was quietly planning to slay the people he saw as his own enemies.

Eliran Golan, a 22-year-old from Haifa, is under arrest for a three-year-long bombing campaign against Israeli Arabs, including a bombing against a member of Knesset.

Only one person was hurt in nine attacks attributed to Golan, suggesting that he is inept with explosives. But police said last week that more than 30 homemade devices had been found in Golan's room when he was arrested, suggesting that Golan had the makings of a major terrorist.

At his arraignment in Haifa District Court, Golan pleaded guilty to nine counts of politically motivated violence.

"He declares himself a member of the ideological far right, and made this clear during interrogation – that he was active against Arab targets, that he hated Arabs," a chief police investigator, Effi Paz, told Army Radio.

Golan's father, Meir, a civilian who works for the Israel Defence Forces, is also under arrest on suspicion of knowing about the bombings and not telling authorities. He denies the charges.

The arrests were made public last week after a gag order was lifted, and they sent shock waves through a nation used to equating Jewish terrorism with fringe settler groups in the West Bank and Gaza.

Last September, three Jewish settlers were jailed for 12 to 15 years for trying to bomb an Arab girls school in Jerusalem. Police and the Shin Bet are still searching for the perpetrators of drive-by shootings in the West Bank that killed at least eight Palestinians during the current intifadah.

The fact Golan was from Haifa, known as a haven of Jewish-Arab co-existence, made the arrest even more unsettling for some Israelis. According to media reports, Golan allegedly tried to bomb the homes of Jews who socialized with Arabs in the picturesque port city.

Issam Mahoul, the Arab lawmaker from the pro-Communist Hadash Party who survived a bomb attack on his car last year unscathed, said Golan's arrest hardly puts him at ease.

"If truth be told, I am not yet calm," he said. "I welcome the police efforts, but I think they have only uncovered the tip of the iceberg.

"Jewish terrorism is alive and well," he said.

Mahoul, a Haifa resident, said he has been under continuous guard since the attack. According to police, Golan had gathered information on at least four other Arab lawmakers.

Israel's minister for internal security, Tzachi Hanegbi, cautioned against viewing Golan's arrest as a sign of a new groundswell of Jewish terrorism.

"This is apparently a case of an individual fuelled by hatred who took his life in his hands and devoted himself to a mission of hurting Arabs," he said.

The Israeli daily Ma'ariv said the first break in the case came when someone, presumably Golan, sent a note to the newspaper's Haifa office claiming responsibility for the bombing of a local mosque in the name of "The New Jewish Underground, Section One."

Several West Bank settlers known as the Jewish Underground were jailed in the 1980s for a series of vigilante attacks on Palestinians.

Ha'aretz reported that an Arab woman injured in that attack is still fighting for the National Insurance Institute to recognize her welfare eligibility as a victim of terrorism.

Israel, India sign billion dollar Phalcon deal

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper

JERUSALEM — Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) will be providing the Indian Air Force with three advanced Phalcon early-warning spy planes, for a cost of $1.1 billion (US) – the largest ever for Israel's thriving security export industry.

The final agreement was signed last Friday in New Delhi by IAI CEO Moshe Keret and the head of the Indian Defence Ministry's procurement division, M.C. Mahopatra. Details of the deal were finalized during a visit to India by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon several months ago.

The payment for the planes will be spread out over a number of years. According to IAI insiders, India will pay around 25 per cent of the sum, some $300 million (US), as a down payment, and the IAI will officially enter the order in its books.

The director general of the defence ministry, Amos Yaron, said last Friday the signing of the deal represents a breakthrough for the defence industry.

"The Phalcon deal will contribute to the Israeli economy and improve the reputation of the Israeli defence industry in the global market," Yaron said.

> 'Will improve the reputation of the Israeli defence industry in the global market'

Under stiff U.S. pressure, Israel cancelled a similar sale to China in 2000. At the time, the United States argued that such aircraft would increase the threat to Taiwan and endanger U.S. pilots in case of war with China. The Phalcon is a competitor to the U.S. Airborne Warning and Control System AWACS aircraft.

The Times of India reported in January that the White House had made clear to Indian officials it supported the sale by Israel to India of the Phalcon and Arrow anti-missile systems.

"Seemingly overriding objections from the State Department, White House officials told their Indian counterparts that Washington did not oppose the transaction," the Times reported.

The Phalcon mates avionics from state-owned Israel Aircraft Industries with Russian Ilyushin airliners. An IAI spokesperson said the move by the security cabinet, which consists of Sharon and several senior ministers, paved the way for the final deal to be signed within several weeks.

Last year, U.S. officials pressed Israel to postpone the Phalcon sale, citing increased tensions between India and Pakistan, two nuclear powers, but they later withdrew it's objections.

There is no U.S.-made equipment in the system, which consists of a long-range radar mounted on the Russian-made planes. However, Israel co-ordinates its sales with Washington, its main ally.

An agreement for the deal was signed in October and last month, Israeli, Russian and Indian officials completed the required diplomatic protocol for it to go through.

Israel has grown closer to India in recent years, and has become an important arms supplier to the country. India wants to strengthen its defences by acquiring the airborne warning and control systems, which can detect aerial threats and serve as a platform to direct combat planes to targets.

But neighbouring Pakistan has criticized what it called India's weapons shopping spree as dangerous for the subcontinent, where the two major powers have fought three wars since gaining independence from Britain in 1947.

EU, UK gave PA $25 million to buy advice

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Britain and other European Union states have given the Palestinians more than 20 million euros to pay for legal and general consultation for the security fence hearing in the International Court of Justice in The Hague, the European Institute for Research on the Middle East has learned.

Britain, Sweden, Denmark, Holland and Norway paid the funds to the PLO negotiations aid department (NAD) and the negotiations support unit (NSU), which in recent months have been busy mustering international support for the hearing, the institute reported last week.

The institute had asked several states for details of the aid they gave the Palestinian Authority (PA) for consultations, but research editor Nick Lambert said, "Various states piled obstacles in our path and some refused to co-operate, although they claim a policy of transparency."

Sweden at first banned publication of the funds it gave the PA, but a few weeks ago said it transferred 1.85 million euros and had recently decided to renew its aid to the NSU.
